and the same beginning of Nations, after the floud; & that the first planters of all parts of the World, were said to be mighty and Giant-like men; & that, as Phænicia, Aegypt Lybia, & Greece, had Hercules, Oreftes, Ant aus, Typhon, and the like ; as Denmarke had Starchaterus, remembred by Saxo Grammaticus; as Scythia, Britanie, & other Regions had Giants for their first Inhabitants; so this Isle of Sicil had her Lestrigones & Cyclopes. This discourse I could also reject for fained and fabulous, did not Moses make us know that the Zamzummims, Emims, Anakims, & Og of Basan, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountaines and Defarts of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding strength and stature, and of the races of Giants: and were it not, that Tertullian, S. Augustine, Nicephorm, Procopius, Isidore, Plinie, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, August de Civil. Plut arch, and many other Authors, have confirmed the opinion. Yea, Vesputius, in his Del hb. 15. Et second Navigation into America, bath reported that himselfa hath second Navigation into America, bath reported fecond Navigation into America, hath reported, that himselfe hath seene the like menin those parts. Againe, whereas the selfe-same is written of all Nations, that is written Procap. lib. 2. de of any one; as touching their simplicity of life, their meane fare, their feeding on accorns and rootes, their poore cottages, the covering of their bodies with the skins of beafts. their hunting, their armes, and weapons, and their warfare, their first passages over great Rivers & Armes of the Sea, upon rafts of trees tied together; & afterward, their making boats, first of twigs and leather, then of wood; first with Oares, & then with Saile; that they esteemed as gods, the first finders out of Arts; as of Husbandrie, of Lawes, and of Policie: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all lived in the same newnesse of time, which we call Old time, and had all the same want of his instruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankinde. For other teaching had they none, that were removed farre off from the Hebrewes, (who inherited the knowledge of the first Patriarchs) than that from variable effects they beganne, by time and degrees, to finde out the causes: from whence came Philosophic Naturall; as the Morall did from disorder and confusion; and the Law from cruelty and oppression. But it is certaine, that the Age of Time hath brought forth stranger and more incredible things, than the Infancie. For wee have now greater Giants, for vice and injustice, than the World had in those daies, for bodily strength; for cottages, and houses of clay and timber, we have raifed Palaces of stone; we carve them, we paint them, and adorne them with gold, infomuch as men are rather knowne by their houses, than their houses by them; we are fallen from two dishes, to two hundred; from water, to wine & drunkennesse; from the covering of our bodies with the skinnes of beasts, not onely to sike and gold, but to the very skinnes of men. But to conclude this digreffion, Time will also take revenge of the excesse, which it hath brought forth; Quam long a dies peperit, longiorque auxit, longi sima subruet : Long time brought forth, longer time increased it, and a time, longer than the rest, Shall overthrow it.

The plantation of the Greekes in Sicill.

Hen the first inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicill: ithappened, that one Theocles, a Greek, being drivenupon that coast by an Easterly wind, & finding true the commendations thereof, which had been thought fabulous, being delivered only by Poets, gave information to the Athenians of this his discoveric, & proposed unto them the benefit of this casie conquest offering to become their guide. But Theocles was as little regarded by the Athenians, a Columbia, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the English. Wherefore he tooke the fam courfe that Columbus afterwards did. He over-laboured not himselfe in perswading the Noble Athenians (who thought themselves to bee well enough already) to their own profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needie and industrious, by whom h project was gladly entertained. By these was built the Citie of Naxus, and a Colon planted of Eubæans.

But the rest of the Greekes were wifer than our Westerne Princes of Europe: they had no Pope, that should forbid them to occupie the voide places of the World Archias of Corinth followed the Eubæans, and landed in Sicill, neere unto that City called afterward * Syracuse: of which, that part onely was then compassed with a wall, *syracuse, as ciwhich the Aetolians called Homothermon; the Greeks, Nasos; the Latines, Infula. He with wordares, was his Corinthians having overcome the Siculi, drave them up into the Country; and after the greater, & most goodly Ciafew years, their multitudes increasing, they added unto the City of the Hand, that of A- tie of all that tradina, Tycha, and Neapolis. In short frong, & of an time the Greeks did possesse the better part of all the Sea-coast; forcing the Sicilians to specific from eyewithdraw themelves into the fast and mountainous parts of the Iland, making their recentance, by Royall residence in Trinacia.

About 45. years after Archias had taken Syracuse; Antiphemus and Entimus, the one was without the from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Army into Sicil, and built Gela; whose both sides banke Citizens, one hundred and eight years after, did erect that magnificent and renowned city up, and fulfained with beauof Agrigentum, governed according to the Lawes of the Dorians.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a detestable En-siilian, this give, gave an hollow Bull of braffe, whereinto inclose men, and scortch them to death: 500dly city for praising the device with this commendation, That the noise of one tormented therein, came the featof fould bee like unto the bellowing of a Bull. After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their liberty, & enjoyed it long, younger: the There infurped the government of the Common-weale at which time also Panatius fixt, Dien: the madehimfelf Lord of Leontium; & Cleander, of Gela: but Cleander, having ruled feven feven agathories yeares, was flaine by one of the Citizens. After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descended from the Khodians, which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greeks, seated themselves in Sicil) that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former war, with notable successe, became Lord of Gela. He, after his Masters death, breaking the trust committed unto him by Hippocrates over his childeen, and being in possession of Gela, tooke the occasion and advantage of a contention in Syracuse, betweene the Magistrates and the People. For comming with a strong Army to the succour of the Governours, driven out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, and (indeed) the most famous, that ever governed the Syracustans. This change happened in the second yeere of the threefcore and twelfth Olympiad; wherein the better to establish himselse, he tooketo wife to the Daughter of Thero, who had also usurped the state of Agrigentum.

Now this Gelon, the sonne of Dinomenes, had three brethren; Hiero, Polyżelus, and Thrasphulus: to the first of which he gave up the Citie of Gela, when hee had obtained the Principalitie of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts travelled in the strengthening, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuse. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracufians who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracuse. The Megarians that had moved a war against him, he overcame; the richer fort he brought unto Syracuse; and the people he sold for flaves. In like manner dealt he with other places upon the like occasion. Not long after this, There, a Prince of the Agrigentines, having dispossest Terillus of his Citie Himera; the Carthaginians were drawne into the quarrell by Anaxilus, Lord of Messena, Father-in-law to Terillus: and Gelon was also solicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after divers conflicts, the Carthaginians, and other Africans, led by Amilear. were overthrowne by Gelon: and an hundred and fifty thousand of them left their bo-

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Laced amonians sent for succour, when Xernes with his huge Army past the Hellespont. He, for their reliefe having armed thirty thousand Souldiers, and two hundred thips, refused neverthelesse to send them into Greece, because they refused him the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or Land. So hee used to their Embassadors only this saying, That their Spring was withered; accounting the Army, by him prepared, to be the very flower of the Greeke

The Carthaginians, after this great loffe received, fearing the invafion of their owne Countrie, fent to Gelon by their Embassadours, to desire peace, who grants it them on these conditions: That from thenceforth they should not facrifice their children to S4turne; That they should pay him 2000, talent of silver, and present him with two armed ships, in figne of amitie. These conditions the Carthaginians, not only willingly accepted, but with the two thousand talents, and the ships for warre, they sent unto Demarata, Gelons wife, a crowne, valued at an hundred talents of gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The warres ended, and Sicilin peace, Gelon beautified the Temples of the gods, & erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloved and honoured of his Subjects, he left the World, and left for his Successor his brother Hiero. Philists and Pliny report, That, when his body was burnt, according to the custome of that Age, a Dogge of his, which alwaies waited on him, ranne into the fire, and suffered himfelfe to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his brother fucceeded, a man rude, cruell, coverous, and fo fulpicious of his brethren Polyzelu, and Thrafybulus, as hee fought by all meanes to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this, by the conversation which he had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the fludy of good Arts. Divers quartely he had, as well with Theron of Agrigentum, as with other cities: all which he shortly af ter compounded, and gave a notable overthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to invade Sicil, fearing the fuccours which Gelon had prepared, to aidethe Gre cians, against him. He also overthrew in battaile Thrasydam, the sonne of Theron, and thereby restored the Agrigentines, to their former liberty. But in the end, he los the love of the Syracustans; and after he had reigned eleven yeeres, he left the King dome to his brother Thrasphulm, who became a most unjust and bloudy Tyrant. Thrasp dome to his brother Thrasphulm, who became a more than the bulus injoyed his Principality no longer than ten moneths. For, notwithstanding the force of mercenary Souldiers, which he entertained for his guards, he was beaten out of Syracuse by the Citizens; to whom, being besieged in Acradina, he restored the governement, and was banished the Iland. From whence he failed into Greece, where he died a private man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracusians recovered againe their former liberty, as all the rest of the Cities did, after which they had never fought, had the Succeffors of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principality of Syracuse. For in all changes of Estates, the prefervation ought o answer the acquisition. Where a liberall, valiant, and advised Prince. hathobtained any new Signiory, and added it to that of his owne, or exalted himfelfe from being a private man, to the dignity of a Prince; it behooveth the Successour to maintaine it by the same way and art, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blowes, ere that she could cleanse her ele of the creatures and lovers of Gelon) was now againe become Mistresse of her file, and held her selfe free, well neere threescore yeares, to the time of Dionysius; hough the were in the meane while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her owne scale

Now, to prevent the greatnesse of any one among them, for the suture, they devised alinde of banishment of such among them, as were suspected; taking patterne from the Athenian Oftracifme. They called this their new devised judgment of exile, Petalismus, wherein every one wrote upon an Olive leafe (as at Athens they wrote upon shells) the mme of him, whom he would have expelled the City. He that had most suffrages mint him, was banished for five yeeres. Hereby in a short time, it came to passe that who of judgement, and best able to governe the Common-weale, were by the worst the, either supprest, or thrust out of the City. Yea, such as feared this Law, though my had not yet felt it, withdrew themselves as secretly as they could; seeking some had of more security, wherein to maintaine themselves. And good reason they had bto doe; seeing that there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerfull and mhorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not very long. For their necessity taught him to abolish it, and restore agains the wifer fort unto the Government from which, the Nobility having practifed to banish one another, the State became alwether Popular. But after a while, being invaded by Ducetim, King of the Sicilians, minhabited the inner part of the Iland (who had already taken Enna, and some other of the Gracian Cities, and overthrowne the Army of the Agregentines) the Syracufor fent forces against him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs, called Illian. This their Captaine made nothing so much haste to finde out Ducetius, against mom he was imployed, as he did to flee from the Army, he led, as soone as Ducetius mented him battell. So for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracusians

But making better choice among those whom they had banished, they levie other toupes: by whom, in conclusion, Ducetius being beaten, submitteth himselfe, and is offrained to leave the Iland for a time. Yet it was not longere he returned againe and witthe City Collatina on the Sea-fide.

Ducetius being dead; all the Greek Cities did in a fort acknowledge Syracuse: Trinamexcepted; which also by force of armes, in the fourescore and fift Olympiad, they lought to reason.

But they doe not long enjoy this their Superintendencie. For the Citizens of Leonbeing opprest by them, seeke aide from the Athenians, about the fixt year of the luponne fian Warre. In this fuite they prevailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Ohor; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, under the leading of Lathe, and Charwodes. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with some supplies brought by sophocles, Pythodorus, Eu-Imedon and other Athenian Captains, they invaded the Territories of the Syracufiant, adtheir Partisans; wanne and lost divers places; tooke Messana; and, in the feventh feare of the Peloponnesian Warre, lost it againe. They also at the same time, arrempad Hymera, but in vaine. The fire of this quarrell tooke hold upon many Cities, which did invade each others Territory with great violence. But when they had caried themselves on all hands, & yet could see none ifflie of the warre, the Leontines, without the advice of the Asherians, came to anaccord with the Syraoufians, and were admitted into their fociety, with equal freedome. So the Athenians, who hoped to have greatned themselves in sicil, by the division and civill warre, were disappointed of their expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and faine to be gone with the broken remainder of their fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the custome of popular Estates) by taking revenge upon their owne Commanders. So they banished Pythodorm, & Sophocles, & laid an heavie fine upon Eurymedon. Shortly after this followed the most memorable war, that ever was made by the Greeks in Sicils which was that of the Athenians, against the Selinuntines & Syracusians, in savour of the Cities of Egesta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppress the Egestans. & they of Syracuse the Leontines, & the Catanians : which was the ground of the war. For the Athenians undertooke the protection of their old friends: and, in hatred of the Athenians, aide from Lacedamon was sent to the Syracusians. The Lacedamonians dealt plainly, having none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to help a people of their owne Tribe, that craved their fuccour, being in diffresse. The Atheniant scarce knew what to pretend : for their preparations were so great, as discovered their intent to be none other, than the conquest of the whole Iland. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their owne passions, that they would not believe their owne eies; which presented unto them a Fleet and Army, far greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the city of Athens had engaged all her power; as regarding, not onely the greatnesse of the enterprise, but the necessity of sinishing it in a short space of time. For the Lacedamonians (as hath already been shewed in due place) stood at that time in such broken terms of peace with Athens, as differed not much from open warre. Wherefore it was thought necessary, either to spare cost in this great expedition, or altogether to forbeare it: which was likely to be hindred by warres at home, if their proceedings were slacke abroad. And surely, had not the define of the Athenians binoverpassionate, the arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstain from so chargeable a businesse, and to reserve their forces for a more needfull use. But young counsales prevailed against the authority of ancient men, that were more regardfull of safety than of

Of this businesse, mention hath beene already made, in that which wee have written of the Pelopomessam warre. But what was there delivered in generall termes, as not concerning the affaires of Greece, otherwise than by consequence, doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicil was like to have selt a great conversion.

Though Alcibiades had prevailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voyage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chiefe Commanders therein.

These had commission & direction, as well to succour the Segestans, & to re-establish the Leontines; cast out of their places by the Syracusians; as also by force of armes, to subject the Syracusians, and all their adherents in Sicil, and compell them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supreme Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captaines were sent off, with an hundred and thirty Gallies, and five thousand one hundred Souldiers, besides the thirty ships of burden, which transported their victuals, engines, and other munitions for the war: and these were Athenians, Maintineans, Rhod dians; and Candians: there were, besides these, six thousand Megarians light-armed, with thirty horse-men.

Thutyd.1.6.c.9.

With rhese troups & sleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegiums result to give them entry; but sell them victualls for their mony. From thence they sent to the Ege stans, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the warre, seeing for their sakes they had entred thereinto. But they found by their answers, that these Egesum were poore, and that they had abused the Athenians surther were discouraged, whenthe sould having in all but 30. talents. The Athenians surther were discouraged, whenthe sould that the Rhegians, their ancient friends, and allied unto the Leontines, resulted trust them within their Walls. Hereupon Nicias adviseth to depart towards the simunines, and to force them, or persuade them to an agreement with the Egesum; is likewise to see what disbursements the Egestans could make; and so return again in Greece, and not to waste Athens in a needlesse war. Alcibiades, on the other side, would receive the country of the surface of the country folicite the cities of sicil to confederacie against the Syracusans & Selinuntines, whereby to force them unto resitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus, he perswades them to assaile Syracuse it self, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of divers Cities) they surprise Catana: and there they take new counsels how to proceed. Thence they imployed Nicias to those of Egesta, who received from them thirtie talents towards his charges; and one hundred and twentie talents more there were of the spoyles they had gotten in the Iland. Thus, the Summer being spent in idle consultations, and vaine attempts, the Athenians prepare to affaile Sylothe Athenians to make his answer: and the Atmie was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtaine a landing place very neer unto Syracuse, by this

They imploy to Syracufe an inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust; and instruct him. continued the Syraenfians, that he would deliver into their hands all the Athenians within Catana. Hereupon the Syracufians draw thitherward with their best forces. But in the mean while, the Athenians, letting fail from Catana, arrive at Syracufe, where they land at faire case, and fortifie themselves against the Town. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracufians had the loffe: but the Athenians, wanting horse, could not pursue their vidorie to any great effect. They then retire themselves, with a resolution to refresh their Armie at Catana, for the winter-season. From thence they made an attempt upon Messa, hoping to have taken it by an intelligence, but in vain. For Alcibiades had discovered such as were Traitors within the Citie to the Messenians. This he now did, in desight of his own Citizens, the Athenians; because they had recalled him from his command, with a purpose either to have put him to death, or to have banished him: whereof being affored by his friends, he tooke his way towards the Laced amonians, and to them hegave mischievous counsell against his countrey. While this Winter yet lasted, the Sysurfiant fend Embassadors to Lacedamon, and Corinth, for aid : as likewise the Athenian Captains in Social, fend to Athens for Supplies. Which both the one and the other obtains ned.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth year of the Pelopunation war) the Ashericans in Sicil faile from the Port of Catana to Megara, for faken of the Inhabitants; from whence, for raging the Country, they obtain some small victo-its over the straggling Syracusians: and at their return to Catana, they receive a supplie of two hundred men at arms, but without horse, which they hoped to surnish in the Iland som the Segestans, and other their adherents: they were also strengthened with a compane of Archers, and with three hundred talents in monv.

Hereupon they take courage; and incampeneere Syracufe, upon the banks of the great for, repelling the Syracufant, that fallied to impeach their increnchments. They also received from their Confederates four hundred horse-men, with two hundred other bosts, to mount their men at arms. Syracufe was now in effect blockt up, so as hardly any second enter, but such as were able to force their passage: yet the Athenians received were soldes; among which it was not the least, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was flaine.

Inthemean while, Gylppiss and Python, with the Laced amonian and Corinthian forces, and sake land at Hymera. The Citizens of Hymera, and of Gela, together with the stimutiones, by newith them; for that with these and his owne troupes, Gylppus adventured to march over land toward Syracuse. The Syracusians send a part of their forces once thin and condust him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his awall never unto the Citic upon a place of advantage. At the first encounter they had the hetter of their enemies, by reason that the Syracusian horse-men could not come to but in those streights: but soone after, Gylppus charging them againe, brake them, and constrained Nicias to fortisse himselse within his Campe. Whereupon Nicias made the state of his affaires knowne, by his letters to the Athenians; shewing, that without great implies by Sea and Land, the enterprise would be lost, together with the small Army remaining. These letters received, the Athenians appoint two other Generals, Eurymedon and Demossibenes, to joyne with Nicias: the one they dispatch presently with some supplies the other they send after him in the Spring following.

In the meane while, Gylyppus at Syracuse, fights with the Athenians both by Sea and

Land

Land, sometimes with ill, and at other times with good successe: but in conclusion, he took from their Fort, neer unto Syracuse, the Promontorie called Plymmyrium; wherein the Athenians lost their treasure, and a great part of all their provisions. Notwithstanding which losse, and that the Athenians themselves, in Greece, were (in effect) besieged within Athens, by the Laced amonians; yet were they most obstinate in prosecuting the War in Sicil, and dispatched away Demosthenes with new succours. Demosthenes, in his way towards Sicil, encountred with Polyanthes the Corinthian, with his fleet: both the Captaines being bound for Sicil, the one to fuccour Nicias, the other Gylppus. The loffe betweene them was in effect equall; and neither fo broken, but that each of them profecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the succours arrived to either, Gylyppus To and Ariston had affailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuse, and in a Sea fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demosthenes arrived with threescore and thirteen Gallies, charged with footmen. and (blaming the floath of Nicias) he invaded the Syracufians the fame day that he arrived. But he made more hafte than he had good speed, being shamefully beaten, and repulsed with great losse. Hereupon Demosthenes and Eurymedon determine to rise up from before Syracuse, and returne to the succour of Athens: but Nicias disputed to the contrarie, pretending that he had good intelligence within Syracuse, whereby he learned that the Towne could not long hold out.

What soever Nicias his intelligence was; upon the arrivall of a new supplie into the 20 Towne, the Athenians had all consented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had not an Eclipse of the Moone, boding (as was thought) ill successe, caused them to deferre their departure. But this superstition cost them dear . For the Syracusians, Laced emonians, and Corinthians, with threescore and seventeen faile of Gallies, entred the great Port of syracuse, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, & whereon they had fortified themselves. The Athenians, in the same Port, encountred them with fourescore & fixe Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon; in which the Athenian fleet was beaten, by the leffer number. & Eurymedon flaine. Now, though it were fo, that the Syracufians received the moreloffe by land (for the fight was generall) yet when the Athenians were beaten by fea, in which kinde they thought themselves invincible, they were wonderfully cast downe. For it a was well faid of Gylyppus, to the Syracufians; When any people doe finde themselves vanquished in that manner of fight, and with those weapons, in which they perswade themselves that they exceede all others, they not onely lose their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, besides the Gallies suncke and wrackt, had seventeene taken, & possess by the enemy: & with great labour and losse they defended the rest from being fired, having drawn them within a Palisado, in one corner of the Port, unadvisedly : for it is as contrary to a Sea-war, to thrust ships into a streight roome and corner, as it is to scatter footin a plaine field against horse; the one subsisting by being at large, the other by close imbattailing.

The Syracufians, having now weakned the Athenian fleet, resolve to imprison them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Haven, being about a mile over, and there they came to Ancher; filling the out-let with all manner of Veffells; which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies break though the Syracustan fleet; which lay but fingle because they were forc't to range themselves over all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not, onely mored themselves strongly by their Anchors, but chained the fides of their Gallies together, and laid behinde them againe certaine ships, which served in the former warre for victuallers : to the end, that if my of their Gallies were funke; or the chaine, which joyned them to their fellowes, broken, the Athenians might yet find themselves, a second time, intangled and arrested. To disorder also those Athenian Gallies, which came on in forme of a wedge to breake through, and force a passage, the Syracustans had lest within these Gallies & Ships, inchained to gether, a certain number of loofe ones, to ftop their course and fury. For where the way of any veffell, using oare or failes, is broken, and their speede fore-flowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the relistance oppoling.

On the other fide, the Athenians knew that they were utterly loft, except with an invincible resolution, they could make their way, and breake downe this great bridge of boats; or (at least) force a passage through them in some part or other: which they re-

folve to hazzard, with all their shipping (to the number of one hundred& ten; of all forts) and with all the strength of their Land-armie, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did so disorder the Athenian fleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as, albeit some few of them had broken through the chaines, yet being stopt with the ships without, and assailed by other loose Gallies of the Syracusians; which were purposely left at large in the sea, they were either taken or sunk. Three great diladvantages the Athenians had: the first, that fighting within a Haven, and (as it were) in aftreight, they had no room to turn themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being intangled; the fecond, that having over-peftered their Gallies with Souldiers, who used offensive armes of darts and slings, they had not place upon the decks to freich their armes; the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, namew. to force a passage, by which they might fave themselves by running away. To be fort, the fight was no leffe terrible than the confusion; the slaughter great on all sides; and the noise, and the cries, so lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as furvived, were beaten backe to the Land, with loss of threescore of their Gallies, broken, sunke, or abandoned. The Syracustans did al-Colofe twentie of theirs, with Python, Commander of the Corinthians. The rest of the Athenian Gallies, running themselves into the bottome of the Port, saved themselves by thehelpe and countenance of the Land-armie there fortified. In this desperate estate, the Athenian Commanders goe to counsel. Demosthenes perswades them to furnish with field Souldiers those few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracusians were trimphing, and made secure by their present victorie, to set upon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to returne to Athens. This was no ill counfell. For, as we have hard of many great Captaines (yea, the greatest number of all that have beene victorious) that have neglected the speedie prosecution of a beaten enemie; so might we producemany examples of those, who, having slept securely in the bosome of good successe; hwebeene fuddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of abroken Armie, and have thereby loft again all the honour and advantage formerly gotten. But Nicias opposeth theadvice of Demosthenes: Others fay, that the Sea-men were against it. Whereupon wandoning their Gallies, they all resolve to march over land to the Cities of their Confiderates, till some more favourable fortune should call them thence. On the other side, olippus, & other the Laced amonian & Corinthian Captains, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracustans to put themselves presently into the field, & to stop all the passages, leadigto those Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenians might make retrait. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had dincenough for the present. Which humour in some of our Commanders at Cadez, blus both the Indian fleet, and the spoiles of many other Neighbour-places. Hermomates, the Syracufian, finding it a loft labour, to perswade his Countrimen to any hasty polecution, devised this good stratagem, thereby to gaine time; not doubting, but that teraday or two, he should draw them willingly out. He sent two or three horse-men mof syracuse by night, willing them to finde Nicias, and (after they had affured him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to give him advice not to march away overlastily from the place, wherein hee was fortified; alledging that the syracustans had loged their Armie, which could not long stay there, upon the passages and places of advanage, leading towards the cities of their Allies. Thefetidings Nicias eafily believed, adput off his journy to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the most part) more fearefull than wile; and to them, every thiftle in the field, appeares, by night, a man

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remove; being plerced and purfued with the lamentable out-cries of those that were ficke and hurr: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies fwords. The rest march away, to the umber of forty thousand; and make their first passage by force, over the River of Anorwithstanding the opposition of their enemics. But being every day charged in thermarches, and by the Syraculian horse men, beatenin from forraging and provision of food, they grow weake and heartleffe. The Syracuftans also possesse the Mounline Legas, by which they were to passe rowards Camerina, and thereby force them to bulbacke againetowards the Sea-coast, and to take what way they could being unable proceed in their journey intended. Many hard shifts they made, in difficult passages, and blinde marches by night; which they were faine to endure, as having none other meanes to escape from the enemy that pursued them, and held them waking with come nuall skirmishing. To keep all in order, Nicias undertooke the leading of the Vanne. guard; & Demosthenes conducted the Reare. At the River Erineus, Nicias takes the start of a whole nights march, leaving Demosthenes to make the retrait: who being incompast fed, and overprest with numbers, in the end renders himselfe. The conditions he obrained, were farre better than he could have hoped for; and the faith of his enemies farre worse than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias, murdered in prison. The Army of Demosthenes being dissolved, they pursue Nicias with the greater courage. who being utterly broken, upon the passage of the River Assinarus, rendred himselfe to Gylippus, upon honest conditions. Gylippus sought to preserve him, and to have had the honour, to have brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a Noble Enemy to the Lacedamonians, and who, at the overthrow which they received at Pylus by the Athenians, had faved the lives of the vanquished; Demosthenes, as one that had done to Laredamon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusan Army, diffwaded the rest, by all the art he had, from using any barbarous violence, after fo noble a victory. But the cruell, and the cowardly fort, (cowardife and cruelty being inseparable passions) prevailed, and caused these brave Captains to bee miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to be starved in loathsome prisons; and the reft, fold for flaves. This was the fuccesse of the Sicilian warre: which tooke end at the River A sinarus, the foure and twentieth day of May, in the fourescore and eleventh

Olympiad. The Athenians being beaten out of Sicil; the Egestans (for whose defence against the Selinuntines, this late war had beene taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syraculians. fought helpe from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselves, and their Citie, as their vaffals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicil, yet confidering the prosperity of the Syracusians, & their late victories over the Athenians, they stayed a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refule or accept the offer made unto them : for the Selinuntines were streightly allied to the Syracufians, as may appeare by what is past. In the end, the Senators of Carthagerefolye upon the enterprise; & (by a tricke of their Punick wit) to separate the Synaulians from the Selinuntines, they fend Embaffadors to Syracufe: praying that City, as in the behalfe of the Egestans, to compell the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should thinke meet to allow them. The Syracusians approved the motion; for it tended to their owne honour. But the Selinuntines would make no fuch appointment: rather they tooke it ill, that the Sy racufians, with whom they had run one courfe of fortune, in the Athenian warre, should offer to trouble them, by interpoling as Arbitrators, in a businesse that themselves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would have it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace crave aide of Syracufe; and the Syracufians as ill grant it unto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrement, which the Carthaginians would have put into their hands. Hereupon, an Army of three hundred thousand men is fet out from Carthage, under the conduct of Hannibal, Nephewto that Amilear, who (as you have heard before) was overthrowne with the great Carthaginian Army at Himera by Gelon. Hamibal was exceeding greedy of this imployment, that he might take reverge as well of his Uncles, as of his Farhers death; the one of them having bin flaine bythe Himerans, the other by those of Selinus. Both the Cities, Hannibal, in this war, wonby force of armes, fackt them, and burnt them; and having taken three thousand of the His merans prisoners, he caused them to be led unto the place where Amilear was slaine and buried them there. indrection of the Grant

After this followed forme trouble at Stracufe, occasioned by the banishment of Her morrates, who had lately bin Generall of the Syracufian forces casainst the Athenian The malice of his enemies had to farre prevailed with the ingratefull multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meer vertue, at fuch time as he was aiding the Larred manians, in their warre against Athens; wherein he did great fervice. All the honest fortwithin Syrapufe were forty for the injury done unto him, and fought to have him appealed. Hermocrates himselfe, returning into Sicil, gathered an Army of fixethou fand; with which he began to repaire Selians; & by many mobile actions laboured to the love of his Citizens. But the faction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherefore hee was advised to seize upon a Gate of Syracuse, with some strength of men; whereby his friends, within the Towne, might have the better meanes to rife against the adverse party. This he did: but prefently the multitude fell to armes, & fet upon him; in which conflict he was flaine. But his Son-in-law, Dionyfius, shall make them wish Hermocrates alive againe.

CHAP.I. S.4. +.4.

Of Dionyfius the Tyrant: and others, following him, in Syracuse.

He Syracusians had enjoyed their liberty about threescore years, from the death of Thrasybulus, to the death of Hermocrates : at which time Dionysius was raised up by God, to take revenge, as well of their cruelty towards strangers, as of their ingratitude towards their owne best Citizens. For before the time of Dionysius, they had made it their pastime, to reward the vertue of their worthiest Commanders with

Dienysius obtained the principality of Syracuse, by the same degrees, that many others, before him, had made themselves Masters of other Cities, and of Syracuse it selfe. For being made Prator, and commanding their Armies against the Carthaginians, and other their enemies, he behaved himfelfe fo well, that he got a generall love among the people, and men of war. Then began he to follow the example of Pifistratus, that made himselfe Lord of Athens; obtaining a band of sixe hundred men, to defend his person: under pretence, that his private enemies, being traiteroufly affected to the State of Syraase, had laied plots how to murder him, because of his good services. Hee doubled the my of his Souldiers; alledging, that it would incourage them to fight manfully: but mending thereby to affure them to himselfe. He perswaded the Citizens, to call home. out of exile, those that had beene banished, which were the best men of Syracuse; and these were afterwards, at his devotion, as obliged unto him by so great a benefit. His first favour, among the Syracustans, grew from his accusation of the principall men. It is the delight of base people to reigne over their betters: wherefore, gladly did he helpe them wheake downe, as fetters imprisoning their liberty, the bars that held it under safe cufody. Long it was not, ere the chiefe Citizens had found whereat hee aimed. But what they faw, the people would not fee: and fome that were needy, and knew not how to gtt Offices without his helpe, were willing to helpe him, though they knew his purpois to bee fuch, as would make all the Citie to finart. Hee began early to hunt after the tranny; being but five and twenty yeers of age when he obtained it: belike, it was his delire to reigne long. His first worke, of making himselfe absolute Lord in Syracuse, was, the possession of the Citadell; wherein was much good provision, & under it the Gallies were mored. This he obtained by allowance of the people; and having obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himselfe without all shame or seare. The Armie, the thefe Citizens, restored by him from banishment; all the needy fort within Syracuse, that could not thrive by honest courses; and some neighbour-townes, bound unto him, ther for his helpe in warre, or for establishing the faction, reigning at that present, were wholly affected to his affistance. Having therefore gotten the Cittadell into his hands, he needed no more, fave to affure what hee had already. Hee strengthened himelfe by divers marriages; taking first to wife the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom he had Dionylius, his Succeffor; the other, Aristomache, the daughter of Hipparinus, and fifter to Dien, honourable men Isyracuse which bare unto him many children, that served to fortifie him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, ere some of the Syracustans (envying his prosperity) incited the militude, and tooke armes against him, even in the noveltie of his Rule. But their therprise was more passionately, than wisely governed. He had shamefully been beathby the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at armes, making them suspect that it was his purpose to let the Carthaginians wast all, that he might afterwards take possession of the desolate places; so it inflamed them with a desire to free themselves from his tyranny. They departed therefore from him, and marched hastily to syracufe, where they found friends to helpe them there they forced his Palace, ranfacked his treasures, and so shamefully abused his wife, that for the griefe thereof she poifoned her felfe. But he followed their heeles apace; and firing a Gate of the Citie by night, entred foone enough to take revenge, by making a speedy riddance of them. For he spared none of his knowne, no not his suspected enemies. After that, hee grew so doubtfull of his life, as he never durst trust Barber to trim him, nor any person, no nor fo much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, unstript and searched. Hee was the greatest Robber of the people that ever raigned in any State, and withall the most unre-

After this, he separated with fortification that part of the Citie, called the Hand, from the rest; like as the Spaniard did the Citadell of Antwerpe: therein he lodged his Trea- 10

fures, and his Guards.

He then began to make warre upon the free Cities of Sicil: but while hee lay before Herbesse, an in-land Towne, the Syracusians rebelled against him; so, as with great difficultie he recovered his Citadell: from whence, having allured the old Souldiers of the Campanians, who forced their paffage through the Citie, with one thousand and two hundred horse, he againe recovered the masterie over the Syracusians. And when a multitude of them were busied in gathering in their harvest, he disarmed all the Towns-men remayning, and new strengthened the Fort of the Iland, with a double wall. Heeinclofed that part also, called Epipoles; which, with threescore thousand labourers, he finished in three weekes, being two leagues in compasse. He then built two hundred new Gal-2 lies; and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and forty thoufand Targets, with as many fwords, and head-peeces, with fourteene thousand corflets, and all other futable armes. Which done, he fent word to the Carthaginians, (greatly infeebled by the plague) That except they would abandon the Greek Townes, which they held in Sicil, he would make war upon them : and , not staying for answer, hee tookethe spoile of all the Phanician ships, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the second did of our English, before the warre in our late Queenes time. He then goes to the field with fourescore thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and sends his brother Leptines to sea, with two hundred Gallies, and five hundred ships of burden. Most of the Townes which held for Carthage yeelded unto him; faving Panormus, Segeffa or Egesta, Ancyra, Motya, and Entella. Of these, he first wan Motya by assault, and putall therein to the fword; but before Egesta he lost a great part of his Army, by a fally of the Citizens. In the meane while Himileo arrives; but, ere he tooke land, he lost in a fight at Sea, with Leptines, fiftie ships of warre, and five thousand Souldiers, besides many ships ofburden. This norwithstanding, hee recovered againe Motya upon his first descent. From thence marching towards Messena, he tooke Lypara, and (soon after) Messena, and razed it to the ground. Now began Dionysius greatly to doubt his estate. Heetherefore fortified all the places he could, in the Territorie of the Leontines, by which he suppofed that Himileo would passe toward Syracuse; and hee himselfe tooke the field againe, with foure and thirty thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himileo had divided his Army into two parts, marching with the one halfe over-land, and fending Magowith the other by Sea: he sent Leptines, his brother, to encounter Mago. But Leptines was utterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twenty thousand of his men were slaine, and an hundred of his Gallies loft. It is very strange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authors tellus; That one Citie should bee able to furnish five hundred faile of ships, and two hundred Gallies: (for, so many did Syracuse arme in this warre) and more strange it is, that in a battaile at Sea, without any great Artillerie, or Musket-shot, twenty thousand should be slaine in one fight. In all our fights against the Turkes, of which that at Lepanto was the most notable, wee heare of no fuch number loft; nor in any other fight by Sea, that ever happened in our age, nor before us. When Charles the fift went to befiege Algier, he had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fifty faile of shippes, and threescore and five Gallies: for the furnishing of which fleet, he fought helpe from all the Cities and Ports of Spaine, Naples, and the rest of Italy. But in old times it was the manner to carry into the field, upon extremity, as many as were needfull, of all that could beare armes, giving them little wages, or other allowance: in our dayes it is not so; neither indeed, is it often requisite. Upon this overthrow, Dionysiss postes away to Syracuse, of strengthen it: Himileo followeshim, and besiegeth the Towne by Land & Sea. But the having received aide from the Lacedamonians, under the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himselfe to Sea, to make provision for his Citizens, who, in his absence, take twentie of the Carthaginian Gallies, and sinke fourc. Hereupon, finding their owne successe prosperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill; having also at the present weapons in their hands, they confult how to recover their libertie. And this they had done, had not Phapacidas the Lacedemonian refifted them. It also fell out, to his exceeding advantage, that the plague was fo increased, and so violent among the Carthaginians, as it is said, that above an hundred thousand of them died thereof. He therefore, with the power that he could gather together, fets upon them both by Sea and Land; and having flaine great commbers of them, forceth Himileo to defire peace. This peace Dionysiu fold him for a great fumme of money; on condition, that he should steale away with his Carthaginians onely: which he basely accepted betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him: for he was purfued, and left many of his Carthaginians behind him. The rest of the Africans fell under the swords of their enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while bravely defended themselves, were (after their submillion) entertained, and served the Conquerour.

Many fuch examples of perfidious dealing have I noted in other places, and can hardlyforbeare to deliver unto memorie the like practices, when they meet with their matches: That which hapned unto Monsieur de Piles, was very sutable to this treacherie, wherewith Dionysius pursued Himilco. I was present when De Piles related the injurie done unto him. He had rendred S. John d' Angelie to the French King Charles the ninth, who besseged him therein. He rendred it, upon promise made by the faith of a King, that he should be suffered to depart in safetie, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himselse, of the Duke of Anjou his brother, Generall of his Armie, of the Queene Mother, and of divers Dukes and Marshals of France, he was set upon, and broknin his March; spoyled of all that he had, and forced to fave his life by flight; leaving themost of his Souldiers dead upon the place; the Kings hand and faith warranting him omarch away with enfigns displaid, and with all his goods and provisions, no whit awiling him. It needs not therefore feeme strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus breake his faith, fince Kings, professing Christianitie, are bold to doe the like, or command their Captaines to doe it for them.

Dienysius, after this great victorie, took care to re-edifie Messena. Mago, who stayed asicil, to hold up the Carthaginians therein, is againe beaten by Dionyfius; who is also beaten by the Tauromenians. A new supplie of fourescore thousand Souldiers is sent fon Carthage to Mago; but these take egges for their money, and make peace with Dinnystus, leaving the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to shift for themselves: whom Dianyfus, after a long fiege, overcame, and gave their Citie to his mercenarie Soul-

Hethen past into Italie, obtained divers victories there, brought the Rhegians on their laces, forced them to pay him one hundred and fourescore thousand crowns, to furnish lim with threescore Gallies, and to put in an hundred pledges, for assurance of their fumeoblervance of covenants. This he did, not with any purpose to performe unto them hepeace that they had so dearly bought; but that having taken from them their Gallies, lemight befrege them, and ruine them utterly, with the more ease. Now to the end he ight not, without fome colour, falfifie the faith that he had given to them; he pretended want victuall for his Armie, at fuch time as he feemed readie to depart out of Italie, ad fent to them to furnish him therewith, promising to return them the like quantitie at discomming home to Syracufe.

his resolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, he would then make their refuthe cause of his quarrell: if they yeelded to aide him with the proportion which he defired, that then they should not be able, for want of food, to endure a siege any long ime against him. For, to ruine them he had fully determined, at what price soever. And state reason he had to take revenge of them, if he had done it fairely, and without ach of faith. For when in the beginning of his reigne, he defired them to bestow a ughter of some of their Nobilitie upon him for a wife; they answered, that they anot any one fit for him, fave the Hang-mans daughter. Princes doe rather parmill deeds, than villanous words. Alexander the great forgave many sharpe swords, thever any sharpetongues; no, though they told him but truely of his errours.

and certainly, it belongs to those that have warrant from God, to reprehend Princes; and to none else, especially in publike.

CHAP.I. $4.+4

It is faid, that Henry the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his over-bold and biting taunts, that he used against him before A. miens, than for his conspiracie with the Spaniard or Saveyan: for he had pardoned ten miens, that for his configured the thousand of such as had gone farther, and drawn their swords against him. The contempthousand of such as had gone farther, and drawn their swords against him. The contempt tuous words that Sir John Parret used of our late Queene Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counterfeit letter of the Romillo Prieft, produced against him. So fared it with fome other, greater than he, that thereby ranne the same, and a worse fortune, some

To be short, he made them know new bred from old. He assaulted their Towne on all fides, which he continued to doe eleven moneths, till he wonne it by force. He used his victorie without mercie, specially against Phyton, who had commanded with

Some other wars he made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and razing of this Citie; and those with variable successe. For, as in one encounter he flue Mago, with ten thousand Africans: fo the sonne of Mago beat him, and slue his brother Leptines, with foureteene thousand of his Souldiers. After which he bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him, following therein the advice of Prosperitie and Advertitie, as all Kings and States doe.

When he had reigned eight and thirtie years, he died : fome fay in his bed, peaceably, which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruell man he was, and a faithlesse a great Poet, but a foolish one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for fpeaking against his tyrannie, he gave order to have him slaine, or fold for a slave. Forhe could endure no man that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parasites thereforesis led his crueltie, The hate of exill men; & his lawleffe flaughters, The ornaments and effelts of his justice. True it is, that flatterers are a kind of vermine, which poyson all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better than the worthiest and valiantest mendee and I wonder not atit, for it is a world: and as our Saviour Christ hath told us, The World will love her owne.

To this Dionysius his sonne of the same name succeeded, and inherited both his King dome and his Vices. To win the love of the People, he pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father lockt up and condemned. Withall, he remitted unto his Citizens divers payments, by his Father imposed upon them. Which done, and thereby hoping that he had fastned unto himselfe the peoples affections; h cast off the Sheepes skin, and put on that of the Wolfe. For being jealous of his own Bre thren, as men of more vertue than himselfe, he caused them all to be slain; and all the Kin dred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath bin said) had two Wives; Doris of Locris, and Aristomache a Syracusian, the sister of Dion, which Bro ther-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionisius, who succeeded unto him: and by Aristomache he ha two Sons and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Sophrofine, he gave in marriage to his eldest sonne, and her halfe-brother Dionysius; the younger, called Areta, heb Rowed on his Brother Theorides: after whose death Dion tooke her to wise, being h

This Dion, a just and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exerci of vertue, and that he was wholly given overto fenfualitie, prevailed fo much with Pl to, whose Disciple he had beene, as he drew him into Sieil, to instruct the young King And having perswaded the King to entertaine him, he wrought so well with him, as D onyfise began to change condition; to change Tyrannie into Monarchie; and to ho the Principalitie that he had, rather by the love of his People, and his Nationall Lawe than by the violence of his Guards and Garrifons. But this goodnesse of his lastedn long. For Philistus the Historian, and other his Parasites, that hated Dions seventi wroughthim out of the Tyrants favour, and caused him soone after to be banish out of Sicil, to the great griefe of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had ma offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels betweene him and the Carthan found meanes, by finister interpretation, to convert his good will into matter of treason. They told Dionysius, that all the great commendations, given of Plato, had tended to none other end, than to fosten his minde, and to make him neglect his owne affaires, by the studie of Philosophie; whilest Dion in the meane time having furnished fifty Gallies, under colour of the Kings service, had it in his owne power either to deliver to the Syracufians their former liberty, or to make himfelfe Lord and Soveraigne of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberall offer which he made, to serve the King with fo great a preparation, at his owne charge, begot him many enemies. For they that had fewed the King for none other end than to raife and enrich themselves, and had alreadybeene raised and enriched, thought themselves bound to make the same offer that pon had made, if the King had had the grace to conceive it aright. But the coverous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring that Dion had, were bold to stile his Love and Liberality, Pride and Prefumption; and heartned the young King in his oppressing, and eating up his owne people, of whose spoyles they themselves shared no small portion. I have heard it, That when Charles the fifth had the repulse at Algier, in Affrica, Ferdinando Cortese, one of the bravest men that ever Spaine brought forth, offered unto the Emperour, to continue the siege at his owne charge. But he had never good day after it. For they that envied his victories, and his monquest of Mexico in the West Indies, perswaded the Emperour, that Cortese sought walue himselse above him; and to have it said, That what the Emperour could not, contele had effected, and was therefore more worthy of the Empire, than hee that had it.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented, at first to fend him the revenues of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moveables, at his owne pleafire: not without giving hope to recall him in short time. Had hee continued in this moode, like enough it is, that Dien would have beene well pleafed to live well, shedid at Athens. But after some time, Diony size made Port-sale of this Noble-mans gods, and thereby urged him to take another course, even to seeke the restitution of Countrey to liberty. The vertues of Dion, especially his great liberality, had purthied much love in Greece. This love made him suspected and hated of the Tyrant: wit flood him in good flead, when he fought to raife men, with whose helpe he might mine into Sicill. Yet he got nor above eight hundred (for he carried the matter closeho follow him in this adventure. But many of them were men of quality, and fit be Leaders. Neither did hee doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should bee mifull, that would readily affift him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicil, marched to hunge, entred the City without refistance, armed the multitude, and won all, save the Citadell.

Distrifius was then absent in Ttalie, but hee quickly had advertisement of this danmis accident. Wherefore hee returned haftily to Syracuse: whence, aftermany treaties of peace, and fome forcible attempts to recover the Towne, hee was meto depart; leaving yet the Castle to the custody of pollocrates his eldest Sonne. etere hee went, his Minion Philistus, comming with a strength of men to affist him, Asbeaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recovery of his Counissliberty, had the same reward that all worthy men have had from popular Estates. was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the Citie. He retired himselfe the Leontines, who received him with great joy. Soone after his departure from Syhule, new troupes enter the Castle: they fally out, affaile, spoyle, and burne a great tof the City. Dion is fent for, with humble request : yet, ere hee could arrive, his Souldiers were retired; and the Towns-men thinking themselves secure; In the gates against Dion. But the next night they of the Castle sally againe, with feater fury than ever; they kill Man, Woman, and Childe, and fet fire in all parts The Towne. In this their extremity Dion comes the second time to their succour; belove of his Countrey furmounting all the injuries that he had received. Hee fers on the Garrison of the Castle, with the one part of his Army; and quencheth the reevery where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after he had conquered ofter to the King, enther to compound the quarters of cat leaft) if they refused it, to furnity other here and the swort had well-neare burnt to ashes, and depopulated Syracuse, mians, of whom Dionyjus itood in great teate of the warre against them: his enematic covered the Castle, with the munition and furniture thereof, and sent Apollogrates after Dionylim his Father, into Italie. But their malice, of whom he had best deserved. and whom he had loved most, gave an untimely end to his dayes. For hee was some after his victorie, murdered by Gylyppus; who, after he had, with ill successe, a while governed Syracuse, was slaine with the same Dagger, with which hee had murdered

The better fort of the Citizens, fearing, more than ever, his cruelty. flee to Icetes, a Syracusian borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Icetes enters into consederacie with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not onely to prevaile against to Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their Citie. The Syracusians, being deservedly afflicted on all sides, send to the Corinthians for succour. Icetes also sends thither, and disswades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermedling in the businesse. He tels them, by his Messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were fo ftrong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land an Armie in Sicil. But the Corinthians, being by this treafon of Icetes, more inraged than diffwaded, fent Timoleon with nineteene Gallies, to deliver Syracuse from tyrannie. In the meane while, Icetes had entred Syracuse, and with the helpe of the Carthaginians, driven Dionysius into the Castle, where he besieged him.

Icetes, being himselse a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than how to deliver his Countrie. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he sent to perswade him, to returne his fleet; for that all things were (ineffect) established in Sicil. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium, whose Captaines advised Timoleon to get him gone in peace. They had farre more Gallies there than he had, and were like to compell him, if he would not be perfwaded. Timoleon, finding himselfe over-mastered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliver unto him those arguments, for his return, which they had used to him in private; that he might, by publike testimonie, discharge himselse to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselves, that a victorie, obtained by a few faire words, was without loffe, and farre more eafie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yeelded to Timoleons defire. But while the Orations were delivering, Timoleon, favoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the preasse; and having set faile, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tauromenium, where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Governor. From thence he marched toward Adranum, where furprifing Icetes his Armie, he flew a part thereof, and put the rest to run. It is the nature of victorie to beget friends. The Adranitans joined with him, and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Cattle of Syracule into his hands, as thinking it better to yeeld up himselfe, and the places which he could not defend, unto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he diffained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who, within fiftie dayes after his arrivall, had recovered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to live therea private man, was still invaded by the armies, and molested by the practices of Icetes. For he besieged the Corinthians within the castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vain) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians fend unto Timoleon a supplie of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which are stayd in Italie by soule weather. Icetes is strengthned with threescore thousand Africans brought unto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syracuse)& with an hundred and fiftie Gallies, to keep the Port. This was the first time that ever the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that Citie. With this great Armie Icetes affaileth the Caftle. Timoleon fends them victuals, and fuccour, in finall boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Icetes doe therefore resolve to besiege Catana; but they were no fooner on their way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captain of the Corinthians, fallied out of the Castle, and tookethat part of Syracuse, called Acradi-na, which hee fortified.

In the meane while, the two thousand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marcheth toward Syracuse. Mago abandoneth Icetes, being frighted out of sicil (which he might eafily have conquered) with an idle rumour of treason. This made him return to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did formuch affright him, that for feare of farther punishment he hanged himfelfe. Timaleon enters the Civic; and beats down the Caffle (which he called the neft of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the Civie, when the firangers were fled, in effect desolate; so as their horses did feed on the graffe growing in the market-place. Thereforche writes to Cominth for people to re-inhabit it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greeces many come from Ivalie; others from other parts of the Hand.

But anew storm arifeth- Afdrubal and Amilear, Carthaginians, arrive about Lilybaum, with threefcore and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their provisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thicker, and chargeth this great Armie upon the passage of a River.

Atempest of raine, haile, and lightning, with boysterous windes, beating upon the faesof the Carthaginians, they are utterly broken, ten thousand flaine, five thousand raken, with all their carriages and provisions : among which there were found a thousand orflets gilt and graven. After this, Timoleon gave an overthrow to Icetes, and following his victorie, rooke him, with his fon Eupolemus, and the Generall of his horse, prisoners; whom he caused all to be stain : and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great cruche)he fuffered leetes his wives & daughters to be put to death. But this was the revenge of God upon Iceres, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Areve, Dions wife, and a young child of his, with Ariftomache his fifter, to be cast into the Sea.

He againe prevailed against Mamerem Tyrant of Catana, and won Catana it felf. Manercus fledto Hippon Tyrant of Meffena : but Timoleon, purfuing him, won the town; divering Hippon to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The fame end had Ma-mercus, and all other the Tyrants in Sicil.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians, on condition, That they should not nile the River of Lycus. After this, he lived in great honour among the Syracufians, till is death; and was folemnly buried by them in the market-place of their Citie: the day this Funerals being for ever ordained to be kept holy among them.

After fuch time as Timoleon had delivered Syracuse from the tyrannie of Dionysius, adbrought peace to the whole Iland; the Inhabitants enjoyed their libertie in peace, hour twentie yeares. The Cities and temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant failed in fafetie; and the Labouring man enjoyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. Buit was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to governe, nor how to on by; which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthie to be Kings, to govern them;

bould any long time subsist.

Twentie yeares after the death of Timoleon, there started up one Agathocles among hem, a man of base birth, and of baser condition; who from a Beggar, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captaine; and so from degree to degree, rising to be a Prator; finally, became Lord and Soveraigne of the Syracusians. Many fortunes he m, and under-went as many dangers, ere he obtained the Principalitie. For he had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banisht. A passing valiman he was, and did notable fervice, as well for those by whom he was employed, as Coforthe Syracufians, and against them. For in their wars against those of Enna, and the Campanes, he did them memorable fervice: and on the contrarie, as memorable fersector the Murgantines against the Syracustans. For being entertained by the people Murg antia, and made Generall of their forces, he fackt Leontium, and belieged Syra-We fo streightly, that the Citizens were driven to crave aid, even from their ancient and Murall enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilear was fent by the Carthaginians to relieve Fracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that he got him to make peace between himselfe and the Syracusians; binding himselfe by promise and oath to remaine a friend adservant to the State of Carthage, for ever after. Amilear entertained the businesse, ad compounded the quarrels betweene Agathocles and the Syracufians. Agathochrischosen Prætor; he entertaines five thousand Africans, and divers old Souldiers Ofthe Murgantines, under colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the affiftance of the poore and discontented Syracusians (the Citie also being diided into many factions) he affailes the Senators, kills all his enemies and opposites; Mmmm 3 divides the spoile of the rich among the poore; and gives libertie to his Souldiers, to rob, to ravish, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without controlement: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and strewed the streets with ten thousand dead carkasses, besides those that had broken their necks over the wals; their furie had no further subject to worke on.

Agathecles in an affemblie of the people (being an eloquent knave) perswaded them, that, for the violent ficknesse, by which the common wealth was utterly consumed, hee found no better, than the violent remedies which he had administred; and that hee affected no other thing than the reducing of the State from an Oligarchie, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democratie, by which it had been to governed, from the first institution, with so great glorie and prosperitie. This he did, to have the Crowne clapt on his head (as it were) perforce. For, as he know that he had left none living, within the Citie, fit, nor able, to exercise the office of a Magistrate; fo knew he right well, that all they which had affifted in the murder and spoyle of theirfellow Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the support of a lawless Lord, who had bin partaker with them in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this Rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: againe and againe faluting and adoring him, by that name, as if it had been given to him by some lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a piece of his pattern; but the one was of base, the other of Kingly parents; the one tooke libertie from a common-weale, the other fought only to succeed in a a Monarchie; the one continued his crueltie to the end, the other, after he had obtained the Crowne, fought, by making good lawes, to recover the love of his people.

The life of this Tyrant is briefly written by Justine; more largely and particularly by Diadorus Siculus : the funme whereof is this. The fame Amilear that had brought him into Syracuse, and that had lent him five thousand men to helpe in the massacre of the Citizens, was also content to winke at many wrongs, that hee did unto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpose of Amilear, to settle Agathoeles in lis tyrannie; and to let him vexe and waste the whole Iland; because it was thereby like to come to passe, that he should reduce all sicil into such termes as would make it become an easie prey to Carthage. But when the Cities, confederate with the Carthag inian, fent their Embassadours, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punick faith (fo much taunted by the Romans, as no better than meere falshood) shewed it selfe very honourable, in taking order for the redreffe. Embaffadours were fent to comfort the sicilians, and to put Agathocles in minde of his covenants; Amilear was recalled homeinto Africk, and a new Captain appointed to succeed in his charge, with such forces, as might compell Agathocles to reason, if otherwise he would not hearken to it. All this tended to fave their Confederates, from suffering such injuries in the future. For that which was past (fince it could not be recalled) they tooke order to have it severely punished. Amilear was accused secretly, and by way of scrutinie: the suffrages being given, but not calculated; and foreferved untill he should returne. This was not so closely handled, but that Amilear had soone notice of it. In managing his businesse with Agathoeles, itis likely that hee had an eye to his owne profit, as well as to the publike benefit of his Countrie. For he had made fuch a composition with the Syracusian, as gave himnor onely meanes to weaken others, but to strengthen himselfe, both in power and authoritie, even against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the custome of those, that hopero worke their owne ends by cunning practices, thinking to deale subtlely and finely, they spintheir threads so small, that they are broken with the very winde. Amilear faw, that his Carthaginians had a purpose to deale substantially; and that therefore it would bee hard for him, to make them follow his crooked devices: which if he could not doe, it was to be expected, that their anger would breake out into so much the greater extremitie, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore hee followed the example, which some of his foregoers had taught him; and, for feare of such a death as the Judges might award him, he ended his owne life in what fort he thought best. This desperation of Amilcar served to informe Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. He saw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore resolved to get the start of themin action. Heedissembled no longer; but, in stead of spoyle and robberie, made open warreupon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicil his owne, ere the Carthaginian carthaginian forces arrived: which thinking to have incountred an ill-established Tytant, found him readie, as a King, to defend his owne, and give them sharpe entertainement. They were beaten by him; and their Navie was so Tempest-beaten, that they could neither doe good by Land, nor Sea; but were glad to leave their businesse undone; and returne into Africke.

CHAP. 1. S. 4. +.4.

The Carthaginians prepare a new fleet: which being very gallantly manned & furnihed, was broken by foule weather, and the best part of it cast away, even whilest it was vet within kenning of their Citie. But Amilear, the fonne of Gifco, gathering together the remainders of his ship-wracke, was bold to passe over into sicil, and landed not far from Gela; where Agathocles was foone readie to examine the cause of their comming. Many skirmishes passed betweene them, in which (commonly) the Syracusian had the better. But his good successe begat presumption; whereby he lost a battell more important than all the other fights. One adverse chance is enough to overthrow the state of Tyrant, if it be not upheld by great circumfpection. The war was foon transferred to the walls of Syracufe, within which Agathocles was closed up, and driven to make his lift defence by their help, who may be judged to have loved him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracufe, after that great maffacre of the principall men, made in the beginning of this new Tyrannie, were (for the most part) such as had been either mercenarie Souldiers, infranchifed flaves, or base and needle people; helpers in establishing the present Government; and Executioners of the murders and spoyle; committed in that change. If there were any other (as fome there were) they were fo well observed. and (withall) fo fearefull, that they durft not firre. But it was enough that they all agreed in the common defence of themselves and their Citie; Famine was likely to grow upon them, and inforce them to change their refolution. In this necessitie Agathocles adventured upon a strange course, which the event commended as wise. He imbarqued asmany as he thought meet, in those vessels that rode in the Haven; and committing the government of the Citie to his brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) hee had bethought himfelfe of a meane, both to raise the fiege, and to repaire all other losses. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Hayen, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keepe the befieged from issuing forth.

Now, at such time as Agathocles was readie to depart, advertisement came, that many hips of burden, laden with corne, and other provisions, were drawing neere unto Syratose. To intercept these the Carthaginians hoise saile, and lanch forth into the deep. They were not far gone, when they might behold Agathocles, issuing forth of the Port, with purpose (as they thought) to give convoy unto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheele about, and make amaine towards him, as thinking him the better bootie. He neither abode their comming, nor sled backe into the Cirie, but made all speed towards Africk; and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as the day would give them light. In the mean season the victuallers were gotten to Syracuse; which was the more plentifully relieved by their comming, for that Agathocles had unburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admirall perceived, first, that by pursuing two seets at once, he had missed them both; and secondly, that Agathocles returned not againe, but was gone to seeke his fortune elsewhere, he thought it good to pursue those that were sted, and to attend so well upon them, that they should not have leisure to doe mischiese in some other part.

The Carthaginian Navie followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of fuch as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and overtooke him after fixe dayes. He had (at the first) a great start of them; so that (belike) they rowed hard, and twented them selves in seeking their owne missfortune: for he sought with them, and bear them; and, having sunke or taken many, drave the rest to slie which way they could, laden with such strange tidings of his voyage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he discover unto them his project letting them understand, that there was no better way to divert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuse but from all the Ile of Sicilsthan by bringing the war to their Owndoors. For here (said he) they have many that hate them, and that will readily take arms against them, as soone as they perceive that there is an Armie on foot, which dares to looke upon their walls. Their Townes are ill fortified, their people untrained, and unexperienced in dangers; the mercenarie forces, that they levie in these parts, will rather follow us than them, if we offer greater wages than they can give: which we may better promise and make good, by letting them have some share with us in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making forme addition to their fipends. Thus he talked, as one alreadie Mafter of all the riches in Africk; and with many brave words encouraged his men fo well, that they were contented to fet fire on all their thips (referving one or two to use as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remaine, fave onely in victorie. In this heat of resolution, they win by force two Cities: which after they had throughly facked, they burnt to the ground as a marke of terrour to all that should make resistance. The carthaginians hearing this, are amazed; think it ing that Amilear is broken, and his whole Armie destroyed in Sicil. This impression so difmaies them that when they know the truth of all, by fuch as had scaped in the late Sea fight, yet still they feare, and know not what. They suspect Amilears faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they suspect their principall Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage unto the enemie; they raile a great Armie, and knownot to whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citie, Hanno and Bomilear; great enemies, and therefore the more unlikely to confpire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generals of the Armic levied, which farre exceeded the forces of Agatholes. But it seldome happens, that diffention betweene Commanders produce thany 20 fortunate event. Necessitie drave Agatholes to sight: and the courage of his men, resolved to deale with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victoric against the one halfe of them. For Bomilear would not stirre, but suffered Hanno to be

The reputation of this great victorie, brought over a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian focietie, to take part with Agathocles: who pursuing his victorie, winneth many Townes, and fends word to Syracufe of his good successe. The Carthaginians also send into Sicil, willing Amilear, their Generall, to succour the State of Africk, which was in danger to be loft, whilest he was travelling in the conquest of Sicil. Amilear fends them five thousand men: all his forces he thought it not need a full to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathoeles back into Sicil, than to bedrawn home by one, that could fcarce retaine his owne Kingdome. But thefe good hops had a badissue. He spent some time in winning a few Townes that adheredunto the Syracusians: and having brought his matters to some good order, he conceived a fudden hope of taking Syracuse by surprise. It was a prettie (though tragicall) accident, if it were true, as Tullie relates it. Amilear had a dreame which told him that he should sup the next day within Syracuse. His fancie begot this dreame, and hee verily believed it. He made more hafte than good fpeed toward the Citie: and comming upon it on the fudden, had good hope to carrie it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had layd an ambush to intraphim, whereinto he fell. So he was 40 carried prisoner into the Citie; in which it was likely that he had no great cheare to his Supper: for they strucke off his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome present) to Agathocles.

This good fuccesse of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Ag athocles was bold to weare a Crown, and stile himselfe King of Africk. Hehad allured Ophellas, King of the Cyrenians to take his part, by promifes to deliver the Courtrie into his hands: for that (as he faid) it was sufficient unto himselfe to have diverted the Carthaginians from Sicil, wherein (after this warre ended) he might reigne quietly. Ophellas came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertained. But the traiterous Sicilian, taking an advantage, did murther this his affiltant; and afterwards by goods words, and great promifes, drew all the Cyrenian Armie to follow him in his Warres. Thus his villanie found good fuccesse; and he so prevailed in Africke, that he got lear fure to make a step into Sicil. Many Townes in Sicil had embraced a defire of recovering their libertie; thinking it high time to fight at length for their owne freedome, after that they had folong beene exposed, (as a reward of victorie) either unto Aliense, or to Tyrants of their owne Countrie. These had prevailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common canse: when the comming of Agathocles abated their high spirits, and his good successe in many fights, compelled them to Obedience. Out of Sicil sicil he returned into Africk, where his affaires flood in very bad terms. Archae athur. his sonne had lost a battell; and (which was worse) had ill meanes to help himselfe: his Armie being in mutinie for lacke of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accustomed promises of great bootie and spoyle. It had now been time for him to offer peace to the Carthaginians: which to obtaine, they would (questionlesse) have givento him, both mony enough to pay his armie, and all that they then held in Sicil. For their Citie had beene diffressed, not only by this his warre, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himfelfe Tyrant over them. But ambition is blind. Anathocles had all his thoughts fixed upon the conquest of Carthage it self:out of which dreame he was awaked, by the loffe of a battell, not fo memorable in regard of any acci-10 dent therein, as of the strange events following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old facrifices of children to Saturne: from which they had abstained ever fince they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their prisoners, taken in the battell, to offer unto the faid Idoll, in way of thankfulnesse for their victorie. The fire, with which these unhappie men were confumed, caught hold upon the lodgings neerest unto the Altar; and forcading it felfe further through the Campe, with the destruction of many men, caused fuch a turnult as is usuall in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burne up the Pavilion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away, each of them believing, that the noyfe in the adverse Campe, was a figne of the enemies comming to invade it. But the Carthaginians had a fafe retrait: Agathocles, by a fecond errour, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, he met with his own African Souldiers; and thinking them to be enemies, (as indeed the one halfe of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last battell) hee began to affaile them, and was fo fourly relifted, that he lost in this blinde fight above foure thousand of his men. This did to discourage his proud heart, that being fallen from theneere hope of taking the Citie of Carthage, unto some distrust of his own safetie, he knew no more how to moderate his prefent weak feares, than lately he had known how to governe his ambition. Therefore he tooke the way that came next into his head; which was, to fteale closely a-boord his ships, with his younger sonne (the elder he suffected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to flie into Sioil, thinking it the best course whift for himselfe, as wanting vessels wherein to transport his Armie. His elder son Archag athus, perceiving his drift, arrested him, and put him under custodie: but by meanes of a fudden tumult, he was let loofe, escaped, and fled alone, leaving both his somes behinde him. His flight being noyfed through the Armie, all was in uproare; and extremitie of rage caused not onely the common Souldier, but even such as had beene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold upon his two fonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extremely base, I need not use words to prove: That his feare wastruely as all feare is faid to be a passion, depriving him of the succours which reason offered, the fequell doth manifest His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headlesse companie, and no longer an Armie to be feared obtained neverthelesse a reasonable compofition from the Carthaginians: to whom they fold thosaplaces, whereof they had posfession, for nineteene talents. Likewise, Agathocles himselfe, having lost his Armie did neverthelesse, by the reputation of this late war, make peace with Carthage upon equall termes.

After this, the Tyrant, being delivered from forraine enemies, discovered his bloudie nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his seares, unged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoyles of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. Hee searched was engines of torment; wherein striving to exceed the Bull of Phalarie, he made a frame of brasse, that should serve to scorch mens bodies, and with all gives time leave to behold them in their miserie. So divellish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a flave to his brutish affections. In these mischieses he was so outragious, that he neither spared Sexe, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the slaughter of his children in Africk. But this was not the way to preserve his effate: it threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chased out of their Countrey tooke armes against him, and drave him into such search, that he was faine to seeke the love at Carthage, which by ruling well he might have had in Sicil. Hee freely delivered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phanicians in Sicil, belonging unto them, which were in his poffession. They requited him honourably with great store of corne, and with four hundred talents of gold and filver. So (though nor without much trouble & hazzard)he prevailed against the Rebels, and settled his estate. Having no further businesse left in Sicil, he made a voyage into Italie. There he subdued the Brutians, rather by terrour of his name than by any force, for they yeelded at his first comming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when he had gotten this great fumme. he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoyle the Temples of their gods. Herein (me thinkes) he did well enough to For how could he believe those to be gods, that had continually given deafe eares to his horrible perjuries. Then he returned richly home, with eleven ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his fleet, were cast away by soule weather at Sea. one Gallie excepted, in which he himfelfe escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grievous ficknesse fell upon him, that rotted his whole bodie, spreading it selfe through all his veines and finewes. Whileft he lay in this case, all desiring his end, save only Thengenia (a wife that he had taken out of Egypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the forme of Archae athm, before mentioned, and a younger fonne of his own, began to contend about the Kingdome. Neither did they feeke to end the controversie by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laid wait for the 201 others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well, that he slue his Uncle, and got his grand. fathers Kingdome, without asking any leave. Thefetydings wounded the heart of Arathocles with feare and forrow. He faw himselfe without helpe, like to become a prey to his uneracious Nephew, from whom he knew that no favour was to be expected, elther by himselfe, or by those, whom only he now held deare, which were Theogenia andher children. Therefore he advised her and them to flie before they were surprised: for that otherwife they could by no meanes avoid, either death, or somewhat that would be worfe. He gave them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he even compelled them (weeping to leave him defolate in fo wretched a case) to imbarke themselves halfily, and make speed into Egypt. After their departure, whether he threw himselfe 20 into the fire, or whether his disease confumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but he ended his life as bafely, as obscurely, and in as much want as he first began it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamertines, his Souldiers, traiteroully occupied Meffana, and infested a great part of the Iland. Then also did the Carthanindur begin to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicil. What the Nephew of Agathocles did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that he quickly perished. For the Sicilians were drivence fend for Pyrhus to help them, who had married with a daughter of Ag atholis. But Pyrhus was foone wearie of the Countrie (as hath been shewed before) and therefore left it; prophecying that it would become a goodly champion field, wherein Pome 4 and Carthage flould fight for superioritie. In which businesse, how these two great Cities did speed, the order of our storie will declare.

$. V.

A recontinuation of the Roman war in Sicil. How Hieron, King of Syracufe, for fook the Carthaginians, and made his peace with Rome.

Hen Appins Claudins, following the advantage of his victorie gotten at Mef-5 fana, brought the war unto the Gates of Synacufe, and befreged that great Citie: Hieron found it high time for him to feek peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himselfeby what means be could, when they were not in ease to give him affishance; and foreseeing withall, that when once he had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to fit fill, without feare of molestation, whilest Rome and Carthage were fighting for the masterie. In this good mood the new Roman Consuls M. Valerim, and C. Officilise found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made nle of their present advantage, and fold him peace for an hundred (some fay two hundred)

These Consuls had brought a great Armic into sicil; yet did they nothing else in efsed, than bring over Hiero to their side. If the Syracusian held them bussed (which I find not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the summe of money imposed upon him, and by their performing none other piece of service) all the whole time of their abode inthe Iland; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no lesse to his honour than it was to his commoditie. For by no reason could they require, that he should fiffer his owne Kingdome to run into manifest perill of subversion, for their sakes that should have received all the profit of the victorie: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without straining themselves to give him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proofe of the strength of Syracuse, in the daies of Agathocles: and therefore knew, that it was able to beare a very strong siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more flacke, in fending helpe: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their defire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their owner work might be the easier against them both. Yet indeed, the case of the besieged Citie was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had bin when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason to trie the uttermost hazzard of war against the Carthaginians, who fought no other thing than to bring it into flavery not fo against the Romans, who thought it sufficient if they could withdraw it from the partie of their enmies. Befides, it was not all one to be governed by Agathocles, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the Citizens endured, so long as he might preserve his ownery rannie: the latter, as a just and good Prince, had no greater defire than to win the love of his people, by feeking their commodities but including his owne felicitie within the publkelaboured to uphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to pass, that henjoyed a long and happy reign, living deare to his own Subjects, beloved of the Ramans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himselfe, ere he left their societie, made unwilling to seeke his nine; or their more earnest businesse with the Romans, made unable to compasse it.

S. VI.

How the Romans befiege and winne Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintaine a fleet.

Their first losse, and first vittory by sea. Of sea-fight in generall.

I leron, having sided himselfe with the Romans, aided them with victuals, and other necessaries: so that they, presuming upon his affistance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians finde it high time to bestirre them; they fend to the Ligurians, and to the troupes they had in Spaine, to come to their aide; who being arrived, they made the Citie of Agrigentum the seat of the war, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The Roman Confuls, having made peace with Hieron, returne into Italie; and, in their places, Lucius Posthumus and Quintus Mamilius arrive. They goe on towards Agrigentum: and finding no enemie in the field, they befiege it, though it were stuffed with fiftie thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of harvest being come, a part was a goodly of the Roman Armie range the Countrie to gather corn, and those at the siege grow Criesbuiltby with Roman Armie range the Countrie to gather corn, and those at the nege grow the odds, under negligent; the Carthaginians sallie surrously, and indanger the Roman Armie, but are in the odds, under conduct of arise the end repelled into the town with great loffe; but by the smart felt on both sides, the stand Pylisis. Assignment repelled into the town with great one; but by the inflation on both late, the The compasse Mailants redoubled their guards, and the besieged kept within their covert. Yet the wasten miles shout the wals; and it had sometimes in it eight hundred thousand Inhabitants. This Citic, by reason of the fertilitie of the soll the nighbour-hood of Carthage, give in a short space from small beginnings, to great glotic and riches. The plentie and luxuric thereof was great, as it caused Empedodes to say, that the Agreentimes built Palaces of such summaries, was in their goodly temples, and the such seast, as if they meant to dye the next day. But their greatest prompe and magnificence, was in their goodly temples, and the sures, water-conduits, and sissing the truines whereof at this day are sufficient argument; that Rome its lefte could never boad of the such that the summaries of the summa thes: In comparison of which, the latter workes of that kinde, are but pertie things, and meeter trifles. It would require a volume to expedie the magnificence of the Temples of Hercules, AE Galapius, Control, Juno Lucina, Chassius, Prostropia, Casson and Policy, wherein the Master-peeces of those exquisite Painters and Carvers Phidias, Xeuxis, Myron, and Polycletus, were to be seen. But in process of time it ran the seen. the same fortune that all other great Cities have done, and was ruined by divers calamities of watre: whereof this war present brought

Romans, the better to affure themselves, cut a deepe trench betweene the walls of the Citie and their Campe: and another on the out-fide thereof; that neither the Carthag inians might force any suddenly, by a fallie, nor those of the Countrie without, breake upon them unawares: which double defence kept the befieged also from the receiving any reliefe of victuals, and munitions, whileft the Syracusian supplies the assai. lants with what they want. The befreged fend for fuccour to Carthage, after they had beene in this fort pent up five moneths. The Carthaginians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, under the command of Hanno; who arrives with it at Heraclea, to the West of Agrigentum. Hanno puts himselfe into the field, and surpriseth Erbesus, a Citie wherein the Romans had bestowed all their provision. By meanes hereof, the fa- to mine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agrigentum; and the Roman campe no lesse streightly affreged by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romans: infomuch, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had beene forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this distresse was not enough to make them rise, Hanno determined to give them battell. To which end departing from Heraclea, hee makes approach unto the Roman campe. The Romans resolve to sustaine him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directs the Numidian horsemen to charge the Vantguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to returne as broken, till they came to the bodie of the Armie, that lay shadowed behinde some rising ground. The Numidians performe it accordingly; and while the Romans pursued the Numi- we dians, Hanno gives upon them, and having flaughtered many, beats the rest into their

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths, but lay strongly encamped, waiting untill some opportunitie should invite them. But Annibal that was besieged in Agrigentum, as well by signes as messengers, made Hanno know how ill the extremitie which he endured, was able to brooke fuch dilatorie courfes. Hanno thereupon, a fecond time, provoked the Confuls to fight: But his Elephants being disordered by his owne Vantguard, which was broken by the Romans. he loft the day: and with fuch as escaped, he recovered Heraclea. Annibal perceiving this. and remaining hopelesse of succour, resolved to make his owne way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this daies victorie, wearied with labour, and fecured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; he rusht out of the Towne, with all theremainder of his Armie, and past by the Roman campe without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the morning, but in vaine: fure they were, that he could not carry the Citie with him, which with little a-doe the Romans entred, and pitifully spoyled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purposed rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this Warre, onely to succour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coasts: but now they determine to make themselves Lords of all Sight and from thence, being favoured with the winde of good successe, to saile over into A. fricke. It is the disease of Kings, of States, and also of private men, to covet the greatest things, but not to enjoy the least; the defire of that which we neither have nor need, taking from us the true use and fruition of what wee have alreadie. This curse upon mortall men, was never taken from them fince the beginning of the World unto this

To prosecute this War, Lucius Valerius and Titus Ostacilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicil. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many in-land towns gave themselves unto them. On the contrarie, the Carthaginians keeping still the Lordshipos the Sea, many maritimate places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their own coasts, often invaded by the African fleets, as also to equal themselves in every kinde of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune favoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in ship-wrights craft, astorme of winde thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of five bankes, to the

Now had the Romans a patterne, and by it they beganne to fet up an hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by five on every banke; and twentic, 0 three on a banke: and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed upon the Sea-sands many feats, in order of the bankes in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men. and taught them to beate the fand with long poles, orderly, & as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learne the stroke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, C. Cornelim, one of the new Confuls (for they changed every year) was made Admirall: who being more in love with this new kinde of warfare, than well advised, past over to Meslend with seventeene Gallies, leaving the rest to follow him. There he staied not, but would needs row along the coast to Lipara, hoping to doe some piece of service. Hannibal, a Carthaginian was at the same time Governour in Panormus; who being advertiled of this new Sea mans arrivall, fent forth one Boodes, a Senatour of Carthage, with twenty Gallies to entertaine him. Boodes, falling upon the Confull unawares, took both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good newes, together with the Poman Gallies, and their Confull; he grew no leffe foolish hardie than Cornelius had bin. For he, fancying to himself to surprize the rest of the Roman sleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points provided; sought them out with a fleet of fifie faile: wherewith falling among them, he was well beaten, and leaving the greater number of his owne behinde him, made an hard escape with the rest: for of one hundred and twenty Gallies, the Romans under Cornelius had lost but seventeene, so as one hunand three remained, which were not easily beaten by fifty.

The Romans, being advertised of Cornelius his overthrow, make haste to redeem him, but give the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Duilius, Duilius, confidering that the Roman vessels were heavie and slow, the African Gallies having the speed of them, deviled a certaine Engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby they might fasten or grapplethemselves with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies fides together. This done, the weightier ships had gotten the advantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse serve them, nor their mariners craft; the Veffels wherein both Nations fought, being open: fothat all was to be carried by the advantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Beplides this, as the heavier Gallies were accidentally likely to crush and cracke the sides of thelighter and weaker, fo were they by the reason of their breadth, more steady; and those that best kept their feet, could also best use their hands. The example may be given betweene one of the long boates of his Majesties great ships, and a London

Certainely, he that will happily performe a fight at Sea, must be skilfull in making choice of Vessells to fight in: he must believe, that there is more belonging to a good man of Warre, upon the waters, than great daring; and must know, that there is a great deale of difference, between fighting loose or at large, and grappling. The Gunnes of a flow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together, without confideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of war: for by Such an ignorant braverie was Peter Stroßie lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquesse of Santa Cruz. In like fort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, beene lost in the yeere 1588. if he had not beene better advised, than a great many malignant fooles were that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Armieaboord them; and he had none: they had more ships than he had, and of higher building & charging; forthat, had he intangled himfelfe with those great and powerfull Veffels, he had greatly endangered this Kingdom of England. For twenty menupon the defences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwife, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twenty of ours, to defend themselves withall. But our Admirall knew his advantage, & held it: which had he not done, he had not been worthy to have held his head. Heere to speake in generall of Sea-fights (for particulars are fitter for private hands than for the Presse,) I say, That a sleete of twenty shippes, all good lailers, and good ships, have the advantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships, &of flower fayling. For if the fleet of an hundred faile keepe themselves neere together, in a groffe fquadron; the twenty ships, charging them upon any angle, shall force them to give ground, and to fall backe upon their owne next fellowes: of which so many as intangle, are made unferviceable or loft. Force them they may eafily, because the twenty hips, which give themselves scope, after they have given one broad side of Artillerie, by Nnnn clapping

If the fleet of if wee may an hundred faile give themselves any distance, then shall the lesser fleet prevaile, either Antiquities, against those that are a-reare and hindmost, or against those, that by advantage of overwhich Farelus, failing their fellowes keepe the winde : and if upon a Lee-shore, the ships next the winde a diligent write the wind to fall backe into their owne squadron, then it is all to nothing, the whole in his history fleet must suffer shipwracke, or render it selfe. That such advantage may be taken upon ot Suit: Panis a fleet of unequall speed, it hath bin well enough conceived in old time; as by that Ora-Paleimo, is one tion of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracusians, when the Athe-10 or the first cities that hath been nians invaded them, it may easily be observed.

Of the Art of Warre by Sea, I had written a Treatise, for the Lord Henry, Prince of rope. But it is now time to returne to the beaten Carthaginians; who by losing their adlib. 6. affirmes that it was firft, that was hirt, & long before vantage of swift boats, & boording the Romans, have lost fifty faile of their Gallies: as the time which on the other fide, their enemies by commanding the Seas, have gotten libertie to faile to Thursdades lets down, founded about the West part of Sicil; where they raised the siege layed unto Segesta, by the Carthaginians, and wonne the Towne of Macella, with some other places. ans, & Damafce-

He victoric of Duilius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Navall Triumph, that was ever feene in that Citie; fo gave it unto the Romans a great incouragement, to proceede in their warres by Sea; whereby they hoped, not benefit of all the Citizens & onely to get Sicit, but all the other Hes between Italy and Africk, beginning with Sarthe Citizens & onely to get Sicit, but all the other Hes between Italy and Africk, beginning with Sarthe Citizens other frangers, dinia, whither foon after they fent a fleet for that purpose. Now during the continuance of the Land-warre in maa , asque in valle Danisleme. Sicil, Hannibal, who had lately been beaten by Sea, but escaped unto Carthage, meaning Esau filin Ilac; to make amends for his former errour, obtained the trust of a new fleet, wherewith he rigin Hebrea arrived at Sardinia: the conquest of which Iland, the Romans had entertained for their bus adjunctifum the xtenterprise. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, croffing the Sea from Sicil, arrived multi Damasteni, in the port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They set upon him unawares, atque Pharices, and tooke the better part of the fleet which he conducted; himselfe hardly escaping the triangularem in danger. But it little availed him to have escaped from the Komans. His good friends the suns bearenne Caribaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second unfortunate voyage, that they in the amonific hanged him up for his diagence : for (as it hath beene faid of old) Non eft bis in bello perms loce, quem care; In warre it is too much to offend twice.

For Cicro against Verts, many is the confederate of the Romans. among the fice Cities of Sail After Syracuse destroyed, it became the first Citie and Regallseate, as well of the Goibs and Saracess in that Hand, as of the Emperous of Conflaminople, of the Normans, French, and Arragonians, which honour it holds to shisday, and is much frequenced, for the excellent wine which growes about it.

ginians into the field; being unable to force that great Citie, because of the strong Garrifon therein bestowed: they then departed from thence, and tooke certaine In-land Towns, as Mytistratum, Enna, Camerina, Hippana, and others, betweene Panormus and Mellana.

The yeare following, C. Atilius the Confull, who commanded the Roman fleet, difcovered a company of the Carthaginian Gallies, ranging the coaft: &, not staying for his whole number, pursued them with ten of his. But he was well beaten for the haste he made,& lost all, fave the Gallie which transported him: wherein himselfe escaped with great labour. But ereall was done, the rest of Atilius his fleet was gotten up: who renewing the fight, recovered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs; by which the victory remaining doubtfull, both challenge it. Now to try at once, which of these two Nations should command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a fleet of three hundred and thirty Gallies; the Carthaginians, of three hundred and fifty, *Triremes, Quadriremes, and Quinqueremes.

The Romans resolve to transport the warre into Africk, the Carthaginians, to arrest Gallies, wherethem on the coast of Sicil. The numbers, with which each of them filled their fleet, in every Oare was (perhaps) the greatest that ever fought on the waters. By Polybins his estimation, hath five men there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and forty thousand men; and in those of Quadrirems Carthage, an hundred and fifty thousand: reckoning one hundred and twenty Soul-had tour to an Camage, an nundred and nity mounand: reckoning one nundred and twenty Sour-Oate; and the other. The Roman fleet Trirenes, three. was divided into foure parts, of which the three first made the forme of a Wedge or Tri- Some have angle; the two first squadrons making the Flancks, and the third squadron, the Base: thought, that the point thereof (wherein were the two Confuls as Admiralls) looking toward the remes had five enemie, and the middle space lying emprie. Their Vessells of carriage were towed by ranks of Oares, the third squadron. After all came up the fourth, in forme of a Crescent; very well man-other; and the ned, but exceeding thinne: fo that the hornes of it inclosed all the third squadron, to-other Gallies gether with the corners of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian fleet er. But had this Immot conceive by relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I conjecture, beene fo, they that the front of their fleet was thinne, and firetched in a great length, much like to that must then have which the French call Combat en haye, a long front of horse, and thinne : which forme, each over ofince the Piftoll prevailed over the Lance, they have changed. Behinde this first our ther which hath feldome their Bertalions were more folidar for Aminal of the Country. stretched front, their Battalions were more solide: for Amilear, Admirall of the Cartha-beene seen in ginians, had thus ordered them, of purpose, (his Gallies having the speed of the Romans) thips of a thouthat, when the first fleet of the Romans hasted to breake through the first Gallies, they ther could the should all turne taile, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a victory) disorder them-third, fourth, & felves, and, for eagernesse of taking the Run-awayes, leave their owne three squadrons are reached unto far behinde them. For so it must needs fall out; seeing that the third squadron towed the water with their horse boats, and victuallers; and the sourth had the Reareward of all. According the Oates. to Amilears direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken, the thinne front of the Carthaginian first fleet, which ran away, they forthwith gave after them with all speed possible, not so much as looking behinde them for the second squadron. Hereby the Romans were drawne neere unto the body of the Carthaginian fleet, ledby Amilear, and by him (at the first) received a great losse, untill their second squadron came up, which forced Amilear to betake him to his Gares. Hanno also, who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian fleet, invaded the Romane Reareward, and prevailed against them. But Amilear being beaten off, Marcus Atilius fell back to their fuccour, and put the Carthaginians to their heeles; as not able to fulfain both fquadrogs. The Reare being relieved, the Confuls came to the aide of their third Battalion, which towed the victuallers, which was also in great danger of being beaten by the Africans: but the Consuls, joyning their squadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that partalfo to running.

This victory fell unto the Romanes, partly by the hardinesse of their Souldiers; but principally for that Amilear, being first beaten, could never after joyne himselfe unto any of his other squadrons, that remained as yet in a faire likelihood of prevailing, long as they fought upon equall termes, and but squadron to squadron. But Amilear forfaking the fight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Romane fleet uningaged, and ready to give fuccour to any of the other parts that were opprest. So as in conclusion, the Romanes got the honour of the day: for they loft but foure and twenty of theirs; Nnnn 2

whereas the Africans lost thirty that were funke, and threefcore and three that were

Now, if Amilear, who had more Gallies than the Romans, had also divided his fleet into foure squadrons, (besides those that he ranged in the front to draw on the enemies, and to ingage them) & that, whilest he himselfe fought with one squadron that charged him, all the rest of the enemies sleet had beene at the same time entertained, he had prevailed: But the second squadron, being free, came to the rescue of the first, by which Amilear was opprest: and Amilear, being opprest and scattered, the Consuls had good leisure to relieve both the third and the fourth squadron, and got the victory.

Charles the fift, among other his Precepts to Philip the fecond his sonne, where hee to adviseth him concerning Warre against the Turkes, tells him, that in all battailes between them and the Christians, he should never faile to charge the Janifars in the beginning of the fight, & to ingage them at once with the rest. For (saith he) the Janisars, who are alwaies referved intire in the Reare of the battaile, and in whom the Turke reposeth his greatest confidence; come up in a grosse body, when all the troups on both sides are disbanded and in confusion; whereby they carrie the victory before them without refistance. By the same order of fight, and reservation, did the Romans also prevaile against other Nations. For they kept their Triarii in store (who were the choice of their Armie) for the up-shot and last blow. A great and victorious advantage it hathever beene found, to keepe some one ortwo good troupes to looke on, when all else are disbanded and a ingaged.

6. VIII.

The Romanes prevaile in Africk. Atilius the Confull propoundeth intolerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten, and made prisoner.

Tow the Romans, according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their fleete, fet faile for Africa, and arrived at the Promontory of Hercules , a great Head-land , somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, & some forty leagues from Heraclea in Sicil, where Amilear himselfe as yet staid From this Head-land (leaving the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontory, till they came to Clypea, a Towne about fifty English mile from it. There they dif-embarked, and prepared to befiege Clypea; which, to eafe them of labour, was yeelded unto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa fide; without which all invalions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their owne Carthage, fearing that the Roman fleet and army had directed themselves thither but being advertised that they had taken Clypea, they made provisions of all forts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans fend to Rome for directions, and in the means while wafte all round about them. The order given from the Senate, was, That one of the Confuls should remaine with the Army, and that the other should returne, with the fleet into Italy. According to this direction, Manlius the Confull is fent home to Rome 3 whither he carried with him twenty thousand African Captains, with all the Roman fleet and Armie; except forty ships, fifteene thousand foot, and five hundred horse, that were left with Atilius.

With these forces, Regulus easily wanne some Towns and Places that were unwalled, and laid fiege to others. But he performed no great matter, before he came to Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that neere unto the River of Bagrada, he encountred with a Serpent of one hundred & twenty foot long, which he flue, not without loffe of many Souldiers, being driven to use against it such engines of warre, as served properly for the affaulting of Towns. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Army, whereofthe Captains were Hanno and Bostar, together with Amilear, who had brought over out of Sicil five thousand foote, and five hundred horse to succour his Countrie. These (be like) had an intent, rather to wearie him out of Africa, by warie protraction of time than to undergoe the hazzard of a maine fight. They were carefull to hold themselve free, from necessitie of comming to blowes: yet had they a great defire, to save the Towne of Adis out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their generall pur pose, and yet to disturbe him in the siege of Adis, they incampe neere unto him, an ftrong!

strongly (as they think) on the top of an hill: but thereby they lose the services, both of their Elephants, & of their horse-men. This disadvantage of theirs, Regular discovers, & makes use of it. He assailes them in their strength, which they defend a while, but in fine the Romans prevaile, & force them from the place, taking the spoile of their campe. Following this their good fortune at the heeles, they proceed to * Turk a City within fix- * This city was miles of Carebage, which they affault and take.

By the losse of this battaile at Adio, & more especially by the losse of Tunio, the Car- the fift in the thaginians were greatly dismaied. The Numidians, their next Neighbourstowards the yeere 1556 and West, infult upon their misfortunes; invade, and spoile their Territory, and force those three Keyes, that inhabite abroad, to forfake their villages and fields, and to hide themselves within which he give thewalls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens in charge to Phis. Arilius findes his own advantage, and affures himselfe that the City could not long hold his son to keep out: yet he feared lest it might defend it selfe, untill his time of Office, that was neer fate; towis, this expired, should bee quite run out, whereby the new Consuls were like to reape the of discar rugb. honour of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no respect but to it selfe, perswades ing the Key of him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded unto them so unwor- &cadeg, the Key thy and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with seare, became of Spaine. But now so couragious and disdainfull, that they resolved, either to defend their liberty for two of these distance left man. To the supplies this they resolved, either to defend their liberty for Philip so lost, deto the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arrived at the same time a that hee never great troupe of Greeks, whom they had formerly sent to entertaine. Among these was found them a avery expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had our English passed, & of the overthrow which the Carthaginians received neere unto Adis, gave it were bold, in our publikely, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the time of the Nation. This bruit, rantill it came to the Senate; Xantappus is fent for; gives the Queene Elizareason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made Generall of the African forces, he bath, to wring out of his puts himselfe into the field. The Army which he led, consisted of no more than twelve hands: where thousand soot, and soure thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were we flaid not to the forces wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Libertie, Lives, but brake open Goods, Wives, and Children: which might wellmake it suspected, that the Armies by the dores and p Sea, before spoken of, were mise-numbred; the one consisting of an hundred & forty all, threw it inthousand, and the other of an hundred and fifty thousand: were it not commonly found to the fire. that they which use the service of mercenary Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their owne doores.

Xantippus, taking the field with this Army, marched directly towards the Romans; and ranging his troupes upon faire and levell ground, fittest both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them battaile. The Romans wondered much, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were, that it should soone bee abated. Their chiefe care was, how to refift the violence of the Elephants, Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forelorne hope; that a these might, either with darts and other casting weapons, drive backe the beasts upon the enemies, or at least breake their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely upon the Legions. To the fame end, they made their battailes deeper in file, than they had bin accustomed to doe. By which means, as they were the lesse subject unto the impression of the Elephants; so were they so much the more exposed unto the violence of horse, wherein the Enemie did sarre exceede them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one ranke, before his Armie; which followed them at a reasonable distance: his horsemen, and some light-armed soote, of the Carthaginians Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The first onset was given by the Elephants, against which the Velites were fo unable to make refiltance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battaile was helpfull. For when the beafts had fpent their force, in piercing through aftwof the first rankes; the squadrons neverthelesse persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, having at the first encounter, by reason of their advantage in number, driven those of Atilism out of the field, beganne to charge the Romane battalions in flanke, and put them in great distresse; who being forced to ume face every way, could neither passe forward nor yet retire; but had very much adoe to make good the ground whereon they stood. In the meane while, such of the Romans, as had escaped the fury of the Elephants, and left them at their backes, fellupon the Carthaginian Army, that met them in very good array. It was no even match. The one were a disordered Companie, wearied with labour and hurt; theother, fresh, and wellprepared, to have dealt with the enemie upon equal termes. Here was therefore a greater flaughter with little fight; the Romanes hastily recoyling to the body of their Army, which being surrounded with the enemie, and spent with travaile, fell all to rout, upon the defeat of these troupes, that open the way to a generall overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full victory; destroying the whole Romane Armie, save two thousand, and taking five hundred prisoners, together with Atilius the Confull. Of their owne they lost no more than eight hundred mercenaries, which were flaine, when the fight began, by two thousand of the Romanes: that wheeling about to a- 10 voyd the Elephants, bare down all before them, and made way even to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Armie behinde them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slaine. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they wereno leffe her vaffals, than were the Carthaginians: how infolent soever they had bin in their proposition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their posperitie, which shee never gave nor sold to any mortall man. With what joy these newes were welcommed, when they came to Carthage, we may eafily conjecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to passe in the world, there are many examples to prove, no lesse than this of Xantippus: all of them confirming that sentence of Eurypides, Mens una sapiens plurium vincitma- 20 nus; Many mens hands equall not one wise minde.

After this great service done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus returned into Greece; whether for that he was more envied than honoured, or for what other cause, it is un-

The death of Atilius Regulusthe Confull, was very memorable. He was fent from Carthageto Rome, about the exchange and ransome of prisoners on both sides: givinghis faith to returne if the businesse were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainly faw that his Country should lose by the bargaine : so far was he from urging the Senate unto compassion of his own miserie, that he earnestly perswaded to have the prifoners in Africk left to their ill destinies. This done, he returned to Carthage: where for his paines taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constance and faith, all Writers highly extollhim. But the Carthaginians seeme to have judged him an obstinate and malicious enemie, that neither in his prosperitie would hearken to reason, nor yet in his calamity would have the naturall care, to preserve himselfe and others, by yeelding to such an office of humanitie, as is common in all warres (not grounded upon deadly hatred) onely in regard of some small advantage. Whatsoever the Carthaginians thought of him; fure it is, that his faithfull observance of his wordgiven, cannot be too much commended. But that grave speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of prisoners, appeares, in all reason, to have proceeded from a vaine-glorious forwardnesse, rather than from any necessity of State. For the exchange was made soone after his death; wherein the Romanes had the worse bargaine, by so much as Regulus himselfe was worth. As for the authority of all Historians, that magnifie him in this point; we are to consider, that they lived under the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he suffered with extreme torments, could not be more grievous to him than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither doe I thinke that the Carthaginians could excuse themselves herein; otherwise than by recrimination: faying, That the Romanes deserved to beno better intreated, for as much as it was their ordinary practice to use others in thelike fort. Cruelty doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being customary. It was the Roman fashion, to whip almost to death, and then to behead, the Captaines of their enemies whom they tooke, yea although they were fuch as had alwayes made faire wars with them. Wherefore it seemes not meet, in reason, that they shouldcrie out against the like tyrannicall insolency in others, as if it were lawfull onely

The confideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Atilius his in tolerable demands; and of the fudden valour, whereinto the Carthaginians feare was changed by meere desperation; calls to remembrance, the like insolencie of others in prosperity, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all reasonable grace hath bindenied. In such cases I never hold it impertinent, to adde unto one, more testimonies; approving the true rules, from which our passions carry us away.

In the yeare 1378, the Genowaies won so fast upon the Venetians, as they not onely drave their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their owne fleet within two miles of Venice it selfe. This bred such an amaze ment in the Citizens of Venice, that they offered unto the Genowaies (their State referred) what foever they would demand. But Peter Doria, blown up with many former victories, would harken to no composition; save the veelding of their Cirie and State to his diferetion. Hereupon, the Venetians, being filled with disclaime, thrust out to Sea with all their remaining power, and affaile Doria with fuch desperate furie, that they breake his fleet, kill Dorig himselfe, take nineteene of his Gallies, fourescore boats of Padoa, & foure thousand prisoners, recover Chiozza, and all the places taken from them; and following their victory, enter the Port of Genoa, enforeng the Genowaies bafely to begge peace, to their extreme dishonour and disadvantage, being beaten; which; being victorious, they might have commanded, to their greatest honour and advantage. The like hapned to thie Earle of Flanders, in the yeare 1386. when having taken a notable, and withall an over-cruell revenge upon the Gantois, hee refused mercy to the rest, who in all humility, submitting themselves to his obedience, offered their Citie, goods, and estates, to bee disposed at his pleasure. This when hee had unadvisedly refused, and was resolved to extinguish them utterly; they issue out of their Citie with five thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earle, breake his Army, enter Bruges (pell-mell) with his vanquished followes; and enforce him to hide him felfe under an heape of straw, in a poore cottage; out of which with great difficulty he escaped, and saved himselfe. Such are the fruits of Inand the section in the second contraction in

How the affaires of Carthage prospered after the victory against Atilius: How the Komans, having lost their sleet by tempest, resolve to for sake the Seas. The great advantages of a good sleet in warre, betweene Nations divided by the Sea.

DY the reputation of this late victorie, all places that had bin loft in Africke, re-Burne to the obedience of Curthage. Onely Chypea stands out; before which the Carthaginians sit downe, and assaile it, but in vaine: For the Romans, heamig of the losse of Atilius, with their forces in Africke, and withall, that Clypea was belieged, make ready a groffe Armie, and transport it in a fleet of three hundred and fify Gallies, commanded by M. Æmilius, and Ser. Fulvius, their Consuls. At the Promontory of Mercurie, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, fet out of purpose, upon the bruit of their comming, encounter them: but greatly to their cost. For the Romans took by force an hundred and four eteene of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they staid no longer, than to take in their owne men that had bin befieged: and this done, they made amaine toward Sicil, in hope to recover all that the Carthaginians . There is no held therein. In this hasty voyage they despife the advice of the Pilots, who pray them Part of the to finde harbour in time, for that the season threatned some violent formes, which hath not some ever hapned betweene the rifing of Orion, and of the * Dog-flarre. Now although the certaine times Pilots of the Roman Fleet had thus fore-warned them of the weather at hand, and cer- of outragious used them withall, that the South coast of Sicil had no good Ports, wherein to save their accidental themselves upon such an accident : yet this victorious Nation was perswaded, that storms. Wee the winde and seas feared them no lesse, than did the Africans; and that they were a-coast a Michable to conquer the Elements themselves. So refusing to stay within some Port, as they elmas slaw, that were advised, they would needes put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping feldome or never failes. In their reputation, after this victorie against the Carthaginian fleet, totake a few worth- the west Indies, selfe Townes upon the coast. CHAP. I. S.9.

Seas, before the fame thereof recovered Rome. The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repaire all their warlike veffells, hoping once againe to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their land-forces fince the overthrow of Atilius. They send Asdrubal into Sicil with all their old Souldiers, & an hundred and forty Elephants imbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Army and fleet he arrives at Lilybaum; where hee begins to vexe the Partifans of Rome. But adverfity dothnot discourage the Romanes: They build in three moneths (a matter of great note) one hundred & twenty ships; with which, & the remainder of their late shipwracke, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chiefe City of the Africans in Sicil, and furround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leaving a Garrison therein, returne to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to be doing in Africk to which purpose they imploied C. Servilius, and C. Sempronius, their Confuls. But these wrought no wonders. Some fpoile they made upon the coasts of Africa: but Fortune robbed them of all their gertings. For in their returne, they were first set upon the sands, and like to have perished. neere unto the leffer syrtes, where they were faine to heave all over-boord, that fo they might get off: then, having with much ado doubled the Cape of Lilybaum, in their milfage from Panormus towards Italy, they loft an hundred and fifty of their ships by foule weather. A greater discouragement never Nation had; the god of the wars favoured them no wore, than the god of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enricht them with upon the Land, Neptune robbed them upon the Seas. For they had now loft, befides what they loft in fight, foure hundred and fixe Ships and Gallies, with all themu-nition and Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby received, perfwaded them to give over their Navigation, and their fight by Sea, and to fend onely a Land-army into Sicil, under L. Cacilius, and F. Furing their Confuls. These they transported in some threescore ordinary passage boats, by the streights of Mellana, that are not above a mile and a halfe broad from land to land. In like fort, the overthrow which Atilius received in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them leffe cholericke against the Carthaginians, than before; so that for two yeares after, they kept the high & wooddie grounds, not daring to fight in the faire and champion Countries. But this late refolution of forfaking the Seas lafted not long. For it was impossible for them to fuccour those places which they held in Sicil, without a Navie, much leffe to maintaine the warre in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to fend forces from Messana to Egesta, to Lilybaum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Sicil, making sometimes a march of above an hundred and forty English mile by land, which could not be performed with an Army, and the provisions that follow it, in leffe than foureteene dayes; the Carthag inians would paffe it with their Gallies, in eight and forty houres.

An old example we have, of that great advantage of transporting Armies by water, between Canutus, and Edmond Ironfide. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Navie and Armie, and could not prevaile against London, suddenly imbarqued; and failing to the West, landed in Dorfet share, so drawing Edmond & his Army thinher. There finding ill entertainement, he againe shipt his men, & entred the Severne, making Edmond to march after him, to the fuccour of worcester shire, by him greatly spoyled. But when he had Edmond there, he failed back again to London: by meanes whereof, he both wearied the King, and spoiled where he pleased, ere succour could arrive. And this was not the least help, which the Netherlands have had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their liberty, that being Masters of the Sea, they could passe their Army from place to place, unwearied, and entire, with all the Munition and Artillerie belonging unto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies have bin able to doe it. Of this, an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now living, on of the greatest Captaines, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceding Ages have brought forth, in the yeere 1590 carried his Army by Sea, with forty Canons, to Bieda: making countenance either to besiege Boisleduc, or Gertreviden Berg; which the enemie (in prevention) filled with Souldiers, and victualls. But as soone as the winde ferved, hee fuddenly fet faile, arriving in the mouth of the Menze, turned up the Rhine, and thence to Iffell, and fat downe before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could march over-land round about Holland, above fourescore mile, and over many great Rivers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. Againe, when the Spanish Armie had overcome this wearifome march, and were now far from home, the Prince Maurice, making countenance to faile up the Rhine, changed his course in the night; and failing down the streame, he was set down before Hulst in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Town he also tooke, before the Spanish Armie could returne. Lastly, the Spanssh Army was no sooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, having fortified Hulf, fet faile againe, and presented himselse before Nymegen in Gelders, a City of notable importance. and mastred it.

And to fay the truth; it is impossible for any maritime Countrie, not having the coasts admirably fortified, to defend it felfe against a powerfull enemy, that is master of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spaine than England should be an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second had fully resolved to hinder Sir John Norris in the yeare 1589. from presenting Don Antonio, King of Portugale, before the gates of Lyborne; and that he would have kept off the English, by power of his land-forces; asbeing too weake at Sea, through the great overthrow of his mighty Armado, by the fleet of Queene Elizabeth, in the yeare foregoing. Surely, it had not bin hard for him, to prepare an Army, that should be able to refist our eleven thousand. But where should nthis his Army have bin bestowed! If about Lysborne; then would it have been easie unto the English, to take, ransacke, and burne the Towne of Groine, and to waste the Countrie round about it. For the great and threatning preparations of the Earle of Altemira, the Marquesse of Seralba, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the hastie leavie of eight thousand, under the Earle of Andrada, serve to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sir John Norris, and his Asfociates: confidering, that the English charged these, at Puente de Burgos, and passing the great Bridge, behinde which they lay, that was flanked with fhot, and barricadoed athe further end, routed them, tooke their campe; tooke their Generalls standard with the Kings Armes, and purfued them over all the Countrie, which they fired. If a Roypall Army, and not (as this was) a Companie of private adventurers, had thus begun the warre in Galicia; I thinke it would have made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portugale, and make haste to the defence of their S' Jago, whose Temple was not far from the danger. But had they held their first resolution; as knowing, that Sir 70hn Norris his maine intent was to bring Don Antonio, with an Army, into his Kingdom, whither comming strong, he expected to be readily and joyfully welcomed: could they have hindred his landing in Portugale: Did not he land and Penicha, and march over the Country to Lysborne, fixe dayes journey ? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promifes failed) paffe along by the River of Lysborneto Cafealiz, and there having won the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart ? But these, though no more than an handfull, yet were they Englishmen. Let us consider of the matter it selfe; what another Nation might doe, even against England, in landing an Army, by advantage of a fleet, if we had none. This question, whether an invading Army may be resisted at their landing upon the coast of England, were there no fleet of ours at the Seato impeach it; is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his observations upon Casars Commentaries, that maintaines the affirmative. This he holds only upon supposition; in absence of our shipping: and comparatively, as that it is a more fafe and eafie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer any enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keep our enemy from treading upon our ground; wherein, if we faile, then must we seeke to make him wish, that he had staied at his owne home. In such a case, if it should happen, our judgements are to weigh many particular circumstances, that belong not unto this discourse. But making the question generall, and positive, whether England, without helpe of her fleet, be able to debarre an enemie from landing; I hold that it is unable fo to do : and therefore I thinke it most dangerous to make the adventure. For the incouragement of a first victory to an enemy, and the discouragement of being beaten to the invaded, may draw after it a most perillous conlequence.

It is true, that the Marshall Monluc, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complaine, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to have kept the frontier of Guyenne, they of the Protestant Protestant Religion, after the battaile of Moncontour, entred that Countrie, & gathered great strength and reliefe thence; for if the King (faith he) would have given me but reasonable meanes, j'eusse bieng ardé à Monsieur l'Admiral de faire boire ses Chevaux en la Garonne; I would have kept the Admiral from watering his horses in the River of Garonne Monsieur de Langey, on the contrary side, preferres the not fighting upon a frontier with an invading enemy, and commends the delay; which course the Constable of France held against the Emperour Charles, when he invaded Provence. Great difference I know there is , and a diverse consideration to be had , betweene such a Countrie as France is Atrengthened with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of invalions upon firme land, that these great Cap- 10 taines spake: whose entrances cannot bee uncertaine. But our question is, of an Armie to be transported over Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Country, and the place left to the choice of the Invader. Hereunto I fay, That fuch an Army cannot berefifted on the coast of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coast of France, or any other Countrey: except every Creeke, Port, or fandy Bay, had a powerfull Army, in each of them, to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted: That Kent is able to furnish twelve thousand foot, and that those twelve thousand bee layed in the three best landing places within that Countrie, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nesse, and fixe thousand at Foulkston, that is somewhat equally distant from them both; as also that two of these troupes (unlesse some as other order bee thought more fit) be directed to strengthen the third, when they shall fee the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I fay, that notwithstanding this provision, if the enemy, setting faile from the Isle of wight, in the first watch of the night, and towing their long boates at their sternes, shall arrive by dawne of day at the Nesse, and thrust their Armie on shore there; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margar, (twenty and fourelong miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellowes at the Neffe. Nay, how shall they at Foulkston be able to doe it, who are neerer by more than halfe the way : feeing that the enemie, at his first arrivall, will either make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred shot of great Artillery, and quickly put the first three thousand, that were intrenched at the Nesse, to a run; or else give them so much to doe, that they shall bee glad to send for helpe to Foulkston, and perhaps to Margat : whereby those places will be left bare. Now let us suppose, that all the twelve thousand Kentish Souldiers arrive at the Nese, ere the enemie can be ready to dis-imbarque his Armie, so that hee shall finde it unsafe, to land in the face of so many, prepared to withstand him; yet must we believe, that he will play the best of his own game; and (having liberty to go which way he list) under covert of the night, fet fayle towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, cither at Margat, the Downes, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more easie than to do it. Yea the like may be faid of Waymouth, Purbecke, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coast. For there is no man ignorant, that ships, without putting themselves out of breath, will easily out-run the Souldiers that coast them. Les Armees ne volent point en poste; Armies neither flye, nor run post, saith a Marshall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleete of thips may be seene at Sunne-set, and after it, at the Lisard; yet by the next morning they may recover Portland, whereas an Armie of foot shall not bee able to march it in fixe dayes. Againe, when those troupes lodged on the Sca-shores, shall beforced to run from place to place invaine, after a fleet of Ships: they will at length fit down in the mid-way, & leave all at adventure. But fay it were otherwise; That the invading enemy will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Army of ours ready to receive him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Captains, shall be drawn together (as they were at Tilburie in the year 1588.) to attend the person of the Prince, and for the desence of the Citie of London: they that remaine to guard the coast, can be of no such force, as to encounter an Armie like unto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma should have landed in England.

The Isle of Tercera hath taught us by experience, what to thinke in such a case. There are not many Ilands in the world, better fenced by nature, and strengthened by art:it being every where hard of accesse; having no good harbour wherein to shelter a Navie offriends, and upon every cove or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylva, and Monsieur de Chattes, that held it to the use of Don Antonio, with five or fixe thousand men, thought to have kept the Marquelle of Santa Cruz, from setting foote on ground therein; the Marquesse having shewedhimselse in the Road of Angra, did set saile, ere any was aware of it, and arrived at the poit des Moles, farre distant from thence; where he wan a Fort, and landed, ere Monsieur de Chartes, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip stroffie, flaine the yeare before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold blood, had instructed de Chattes and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquesse his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were flow in carrying reliefe to Port des Moles Whether our English would be perswaded to make fuch diligent hafte, from Margat to the Neffe, and backe againe, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; whereof the French-men had not measured the one halfe when they found themselves prevented by the more nimble ships of Spaine.

This may suffice to prove, that a strong Army, in a good sleet, which neither foot, nor horse, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it lift, in England, France, or elsewhere, unlesse it bee hindred, encountred, and shuffled together, by a fleet of equal or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fayal, in the year 1597. is alledged against this: which example moves me no way to thinke, that a large coast may be desended against astrong fleet. I landed those English in Fayal my selfe, & therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I finde an action of mine cited, with omission of my name; Imay by a civill interpretation, thinke, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any bonour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprize was fuch, or foill managed, as that no bosour could be due unto it. There were indeede forne which were in that voyage, who advised me not to undertake it: and I hearkened unto them somewhat longer than was rquifite, especially, whilest they defired me to reserve the title of such an exploit (though swere not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficulty: I gave them to understand, the same which I now maintaine, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, than to invade it. The truth is, that I could have landed my men with more ease than I did'; yea without finding any refistance, if I would have rowed to anotherplace, yea even there where I landed, if I would have taken more companie to helpe me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that bufinesse, than of safetie. For I thought it to belong unto the homurof our Prince and Nation, that a few Ilanders should not thinke any advantage great though, against a fleet set forth by Q. Elizabeth, and further, I was unwilling, that some Low-Countrie Captaines, and others, not of mine own squadron, whose assistance I had refuled, should please themselves with a sweet conceit (though it would have bin short, when I had landed in some other place) That for want of their helpe I was driven to turne uile. Therefore I tooke with me none, but men affured, Commanders of mine owne quadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaries, whom lould not refuse; as, Sir William Brook, Sir William Harvey, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Stot, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henrie Tinnes, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Throckmorton, Captaine Laurence Kemis, Captaine william Morgan, & others, hehas well understood themselves and the enemie: by whose helpe, with Gods favour, lmade good the enterprise I undertooke. As for the working of the Sea, the steepnesse of the cliffes, & other troubles, that were not new to us, we overcame them well enough. And these (norwithstanding) made five or fixe Companies of the enemies, that sought impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whereon their Musketiers lay on the Rest for us, and won the place of them without any great losse. This I could have done with leffe danger, fo that it should not have served for example of a rule, that failed even inthis example: but the reasons before alledged, (together with other reasons well nowne to some of the Gentlemen above named, though more private, than to be here addown) made me rather follow the way of bravery, and take the shorter course; haing it still in mine owne power to fall off when I should thinke it meet. It is easily said, hat the Enemy was more than a Coward; (which yet was more than we knew) neither will magnific fuch a small peece of service, by seeking to prove him better: whom had I thought thought equall to mine owne followers, I would otherwise have dealt with. But for so much as concernes the Proposition in hand; hee that beheld this, may well remember that the same enemy troubled us more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the thore that he fought how to stop us in place of his advantage, that many of our men were flaine or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to be past, when we had won good footing) would needs follow us to the Towne, were driven by him, to for lake the pace of a man of war, and hetake themselves to an hastie trot.

For end of this digression, I hope that this question shall never come to triall; his Majeffies many moveable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will to no lesse disdaine, than any Nation under heaven can doe, to be beaten upon their owne ground, or elsewhere by a forraigne enemy; yet to entertaine those that shall assaile us. with their owne beefe in their bellies, and before they eate of our Kentalb Capons, I take it to be the wisest way. To do which, his Majesty, after God, will imploy his good ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment upon the shore. The man of the first terms of the construction
How the Romans attempt agains to get the masterie of the Seas. The victory of Cacilius 1 the Roman Confull at Panormus: The fiege of Lalyhaum. How a Rhodian Gallic entred Lilybeum at pleasure, in despight of the Roman fleet. That it is a matter of great difficulty to flop the passage of good ships. The Romans, by reason of grievous lossesceived, under Claudius and Junius their Confuls, abandonthe Seas againe.

Hen, without a strong Navie, the Romans found it altogether impossible. either to keepe what they had already gotten in Sicil, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa or elsewhere, they resolved once againe, notwithflanding their late miladventures, to strengthen their fleet & ships of warre. So causing fifty new Gallies to be built, & the old to be repaired, they gave them in charge (together with certaine Lepions of Soundiers) to the new Confuls, C. Atilius, & L. Manlius. On the other side, Astrubal perceiving that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwracke which they had lately fuffered, partly by reason of the overthrow which they received by Xantippus in Africa, were leffe daring than they had bin in the beginning of the war.& withall, that one of the Confuls was returned into Italy, with the one halfe of the Army, & that Cacilius, with only the other halfe, remained at Panormus: he removed with the Carrhaginian forces from Lilybaum towards it, hoping to provoke Cacilius to fight. But the Confull was better advised. For when Afdrubal had made his approches somewhat neere the Towne, Cacilius caused a deepe trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the Citie: between which and his trench he left ground fufficient, to embattaile a Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gave order that they should advance themselves, and passe over the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust upon them. From those beasts he commanded them to retire, by slow degrees, till they had drawn on the Elephants to the brinke of the new trench, which they could by no means. passe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they were fo gawled & beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, & by those that lay in the trench it selfe, that being inraged by their many wounds, they brake backe furioully upon their owne foot-men, and utterly disordered them. Cacilim espying this advantage, sallied with all the force he had; and charging the other troups, that stood embattailed, he utterly brake them, and put them to their heeles; making a great flaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this victory being brought to Rome; the whole state, filled with courage prepared a new fleet of two hundred faile, which they fent into Sicil, to give end to that warre, that had now lasted fourteene yeares. With this seet and Armie the Romans refolve to attempt Lilybaum, the only place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicil; and all (indeed) fave Drepanum, that was neere adjoining. They fet down before it, and possesses of all the places of advantage neere unto it, especially of such as command the haven, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground fixe Towers of defence; and by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the Citie, as the defendants begin to despair. Yet Himileo, Commander of the place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of Warre. All that is broken he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious fallies, and giveth to the Romans all the affronts that noffibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certaine Lievtenants, and other pettie Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is revealed by an Achean, called Alexon, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, saved Agrigentum. Himilco ufeth the help of Alexon, to affure the hired Souldiers, and imployeth Hannibal to appeare the troupes of the Gaules, which did waver, and had fent their agents to the enemie. All promise constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, being unable to performe what they had undertaken, are faine to live in the Koman campe as fugitives, that had wrought no good whereby to deserve their bread. In the mean while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their reliefe, having Hannibal the son of Amilcar for their Conductor: who, in despight of all refishance, entred the Port and Citie, to the incredible joy of the befieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himileo with hope of great reward) resolve to set upon the Romans in their trenches, and either force them to abandon the fiege, or (at least) to take from them. orset on fire, their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the uttermost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans, being more in number, and having the advantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extreme difficultie defend their engines.

They of Carthage defire greatly to understand the state of things at Lilybeum; but know not how to fend into the Towne. A certaine Rhodian undertakes the fervice; and having received his dispatch, sailes with one Gallie to Agusa, a little Iland neere Lilybaum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and having a passing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Channel, and recovered the water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the shores on either fide.

The next day, neither attending the covert of the darke night, nor dreading to be boorded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he fet faile, and shipped his Oares (his Gallie being exceeding quick of steerage, and himself expert in all parts of the channell) recovered the Havens mouth, and the Sea, in despight of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himselfe out of danger of being incompassed by many, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Haven, challenging any one, if any one durft come forth, to undertake him. This enterprise, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondred at in those dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a-farre off, the adventure which this Rhodian made was not greatly hazzardous. For in this Age, a valiant and judicious man of war will not fear to passe by the best appointed Fort of Europe, with the helpe of a good Tide, and a leading gale of winde:no though fortie pieces of great Artillerie open their mouthes against him, and threaten to teare him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queenes time, when Denmark and Sueden were at War, Our East-land fleet, bound for Leif-land, was forbidden by the King of Denmark to trade with the subjects of his enemies, and he threatned to fink their ships if they came through the streights of Elsenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (having a ship of her Maiffies, called the Minion, to defend them) made the adventure, and fulfaining fome Volles of thor, kept on their course. The King made all the provision he could, to stop them, or fink them, at their returne. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burrough, leading the way, did not only passe out with little losse, but did beat downe, with Attillerie, a great part of the Fort of Elsenour; which at that time was not fo well rampard, as now perhaps it is: and the fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound received. Neither was it long fince, that the Duke of Parma, befieging Antwerp, and finding no possibilitie to master it, otherwise than by famine, laid his Cannon on the banke of the River, fo well to purpose, and so even with the face of the water, that he thought it impossible for the least boat to passe by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blowne up by any wind of gloie, but comming to finde a good market for their Butter and Cheefe, even the poore men, attending their profit when all things were extreme deare in Antwerpe, passed in boates of ten or twelve Tonne, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despight of it, when a strong Westerly winde, and a Tide of floud favoured them; as also with a contrary winde, and an ebbing water, they turned backe againe: fo as hee was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado overthwart the River, to his marvailous trouble and charge.

The Fort Saint Philip terrified not us in the yeere 1596, when we entred the Port of Caliz, neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entred, beate us from our anchoring by it; though it plaid upon us with foure Demi-cannons within point blanque, from fixe in the morning till twelve at none. The fiege of Oftend, and of many other places, to may be given for proofe, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of a good ship, with out another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is to fet, as that of Angrain Tercera, that there is no paffage along befide it, or that the ships are driven to turne upon a bow-line towards it, wanting all helpe of winde and tide; there, and in such places, is it of great use, and fearefull: otherwise not.

But to returne to our adventurous Rhodian: Hee arrives in fafety at Carthage, and makes them know the estate of Lilybeum. Others also, after this, take upon them to doe the like, and performe it with the same successe. The Romans therefore labour to chook the channell; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants ships with great stones, and finke them therein. The force of the Tides cleares it agains in part: but they grounded so many of those great bellied boates in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heape, like a ragged Iland, in the passage. Hereby it came to passe, that a Carthaginian Gallie, taking her course by night, and not suspecting any fuch impediment, ranne her selfe a-ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the brave Rhodian, thinking to enter, as hee had done before : but this Carthaginian Gallie, a little before taken, gave him chase, and gathered upon him; hee findes what shee is, both by her forme and by her swiftnesse: and being not able to runne from her, resolved to fight with her. But shee is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and Lilybaum, after this, is greatly diffressed; the Souldiers being worne with labourend watching. But in this despaire there rose so violent a tempest, as some of the Romans woodden Towers, by which they over-topt the walls of Lilybaum, were over-turned. A Greeke Souldier undertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performes it: for the fire was no fooner kindled, but being blowne unto by the bellowes of a tempest, it increased so fast, as it became resistlesse, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brasen heads of the battering Rammes. Hereupon, despaire and warinesse hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: fo that they refolve, by a long fiege, to starve

Upon relation of what had past, a supply of tenne thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, under M. Claudius, the Confull. Hee arrives at Messana, and marcheth over land to Lilybaum: where having re-inforced the Army, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surprise of Drepanum, a City on the other side of the Bay of Lilybaum. This fervice the Captaines and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Confull embarques his troupes, and arrives on the fudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Governour of the Towne, a valiant and prudent man of warre, who being ignorant of the new supply arrived at Lilybeum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but having recovered his spirits, he perswades the Souldiers, rather to sight abroad, than to bee enclosed. Herewithall he promiseth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall deserve them; offering to leade them himselfe, and to fight in the head of his fleet. Having sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrusts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Confull, deceived of his expectation, calls backe the foremost Gallies, that hee might now marshall them for defence. Hereupon some rowe backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal findes and followes his advantage, and forceth the Confull into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himselfe, having the land on his backe: hoping thereby to keepe himselfe from being incompassed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-roome, so streightened, as he could not turne himselfe any way from his enemies, nor range himselfe in any order. Therefore when hee found no hope of refistance, keeping the shore on his lest hand, hee thrust out of the Bay with thirtie Gallies, besides his owne, and so sled away : all the rest of his sleet, to the number of ninetie and foure ships, were taken or sunke by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this fervice is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indifcretion and flight, as

The Romans, notwithstanding this great losse, arme threescore Gallies, with which they fend away L. Junim, their Confull, to take charge of their businesse in Sicil. Junim arrives at Messana, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Reman fleet, those excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybeum. One hundred and twentie Gallieshe had; and besides these, hee had gotten together almost eight hundred ships of burthen, which were laden with all necessarie provisions for the Armie. With this great feet he arrives at Syracuse, where he stayes a while; partly to take in come, partly to wait for some, that were too flow of faile, to keepe company with him along from Mefsana. In the meane time he dispatcheth away towards Lilybeum his Questors or Treafirers; to whom he commits the one halfe of his victuallers, with some Gallies for their Adherbal was not carelesse after his late victorie: but studied how to use it to the best advantage. The ships and prisoners that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his owne Gallies he delivered thirtie to Carthalo, who had threescore and ten more under his own charge; and sent him to trie what good might be done against the Roman fleet in the Haven of Lilyb aum. According to this direction, Carthalo fuddenly enters the mouth of that Haven, where he finds the Romans more attentive to the keeping in of the belieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their own against another fleet. So he chargeth them, boords, and takes some, and fires the rest. The Roman Campe takes alarme, and hastens who rescue. But Himileo, Governour of the Town, is not behinde hand; who sallies out athe sametime, and putting the Romans to great distresse, gives Carthalo good leisure to

After this exploit, Carthalo ran all along the South coast of Sicil, devising how to worke mischiefe to the enemie; wherein Fortune presented him with a faire occasion, which he wisely managed. He was advertised by his Scouts, that they had descried, neer parland, a great fleet, confifting of all manner of Vessels. These were the victuallers, which the Confull Juneus, more hastily than providently, had fent before him towards Lilybaum. Carthalo was glad to heare of their comming: for he and his men were full of wirage, by reason of their late victories. Accounting therefore the great multitude of loman Hulks approaching, to be rather a prey than a fleet likely to make strong oppofition, he hastens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no minde to fight: but were glad to feeke shelter in an open Roade, full of tocks, under covert of a poore Towne, belonging to their partie; that could helpe to we them only from the present danger, by lending them engines and other aide, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that affailed them Carthalo therefore, having taken a kw of them, lay waiting for the rest, that could not long ride under those rockes, but would be forced by any great change of winde, either to put out into the deepe, or to swether men, how they could, by taking land, with the losse of all their shipping. Whilefthe was bufied in this care, the Confull Junius drew neare, and was discovered. Agunt him Carthalo makes out, and findes him altogether unprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Confull had neither meanes to flie, norabilitie to fight. Therefore he likewise ran into a very dangerous Creeke; thinking hodanger fo great as that of the enemie. The Carthaginian feeing this, betakes himselfe wa Station betweene the two Roman fleets; where he watcheth, to fee which of them would first stir, with a resolution to assault that, which should first dare to put it selfe inothe Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coast of Sicil, betweene the Promontorie of Pachinus and Lilyhaum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the winde formed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of tempest, and their fignes, finding (belike) fome swelling billow (for so we doe in the West of England, before a Southerly storme) hasted to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to cover themselves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight than how to Navigate, and never found any foule weather in the entrailes of their beafts, their Soothlayers being all land-prophets, were fuddenly over-taken with a boifterous South wind, and all the Gallies forced against the rocks, and utterly wrackts

This calamitie fo discouraged the Romans, that they resolved againe to forsake the Seas, and trust only to the service of their Legions upon firm ground. But such a resolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at sea, or else they must not make war in on cannot long a those that have a mightier fleet. Yet are they to be excused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbeare to commend the patient vertue of the Spaniards. We feldome or never find, that any Nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries, as the spaniver find, that any Nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries, as the spaniver find, that any Nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries, as the spaniver find, that any Nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries, as the spaniver find, that any Nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries, as the spaniver find, that any Nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries, as the spaniver find, that any Nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries, as the spaniver find, that any Nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries, as the spaniver find, that any Nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries, as the spaniver find, that any nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries and mi ards have done, in their Indian Discoveries. Yet perfishing in their enterprises with an invincible constancie, they have annexed to their Kingdome so many goodly Provinces, as burie the remembrance of all dangers past. Tempests and shipwracks, famine, overthrows, to mutinies, heat & cold, pestilence, and all maner of diseases both old & new, together with extreme povertie, and want of all things needfull, have bin the enemies wherewith every one of their most noble Discoverers, at one time or other, hath encountred. Many years have passed over some of their heads in the search of not so many leagues: yearmore than one or two have spent their labour, their wealth, & their lives, in search of a golden kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and fift undertakers, have not bin disheartned. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasuries and Paradises which they enjoy; and well they deserve to hold them quietly if they hinder not the like vertue inothers, which (perhaps) will not be found.

The Citie of Eryx is surprised by the Romans, and recovered by Amilcar, who stoutly holds war with them five years. The Romans having emptied their common treasurie, build a new fleet at the charges of private men. The great vistorie at Sea of LuCtatins the Conful; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to crave peace. The conditions of the peace between Rome and Carthage.

He Romans were carefull to supplie with all industrie, by land, the want of strength at sea. Therefore they continue the siege of Lilybaum, and seek to make fure to themselves all places, whither the enemies ships could not bring reliefe. The Confull Junius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which he had received, bethought him what enterprises to undertake. In the end he resolved to attempt the Mountaine and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the fairest and richestof all the Iland; and of these, by cunning or treason, he got possession. Eryx was commodioufly feated between Drepanum and Panormus; fo that it feemed a fit place for a Gamifon, that should restraine the Carthaginians from making roads into the country. Wherefore Junius fortified both the top of the Mountain, and the first entrance of the passage a from the bottome (both of which places were very defenfible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the eighteenth yeare of this war, the Carthaginians sent forth Amilear, surnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a fleet and Armie, who failing to the coasts of Italie, did throughly repay the spoyles which the Romans madein Africa. For he first of all wasted and destroyed the Territories of the Locrines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred he into Sicil, and finding there no walled Citie in the Carthaginians power, that served fitly to infest the Romans, he occupied a piece of ground of great advantage, and lodged his Armie thereon; to confront as well the Pomans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Ergx, putting himselfe between both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilear had feized upon, was not onely very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gave him opportunitie to scoure all the coast of Italie with his fleet, wasting all along as far as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicil he held the Romans to hard worke: lying neere unto Panormu, where in three yeers abode he die many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the enemic could never be drawne to hazzard the main chance. Having wearied himselfe and the Romans long enough about Panormus, he undertooke a strange peece of worke at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Junius, on the top, and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very strongly lodged. Neverthelesse Amilear found a way, lying towards the Seafide, by which he conveighed his men into the City of Eryx, that was about the middest of the ascent, ere the enemy knew of it. By this it came to passe, that the Romans which kept the top of the mountaine, were streightly held (as it were) besieged And no lesse was Amilear himselfe restrained, by both of these Garrisons, & such as came to relieve them. There he found them pastime about two years more; hoping still to wearie out those that lay over his head, as they on the contrary did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

Arthistime, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent unto the profecuting of this businesse at Eryx. Wherein it seemes true (as Hannibal, in Livie, Liv. Dec 3.l. to. fake unto Scipio) that the affaires of Carthage never stood in better terms, since the beginning of the warre, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had utterly forfaken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses; partly upon confidence of their land-forres, which they held refiftleffe; Amilcar, with a small Armie, had so well acquited himselfe, to the honour of his Country, that by the triall of five yeares warre, the Carthaeinian Souldier was judged equall, if not superior to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had beene devised and gone, for the dislodging of this obstinate Warriour: no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once againe to build a fleet; whereby if the mastrie of the Sea could once bee gotten, it was likely that Amilear, for lacke of supply, should not long beable to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficulty was found. The common treasurie was exhausted: and the cost was not little, that was requisite unto such an enterprise. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lav the burden upon private purses. Divers of the principall Citizens undertooke to build (each at his owne charges) one Quinquereme, which example wrought so well, that they, whose abilitie would not serve to be the like, joyned with some others, and laying their mony together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repaied when the war was finished. By this voluntary contribution, they made and finished two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their patterne, that excellent swift rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Rhodian, in the Port of Lihbeum, as was shewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Lustatius Catulius; who past with the same into Sicil the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drevanum, indeavouring by all meanes to have forced the Citie. But being advertised that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand, and being mindefull of the late loffes which his Predecessors had received; he was carefull to put himselfe in order, against their arrivall.

Hanno was Admiral of the Carthaginian fleet; a man(as his actions declare him) wife in picture, exceedingly formall, and skilfull in the art of feeming teverend. How his reputation was first bred, I doe not finde; but it was up-held by a factious contradiction, orthings undertaken by men more worthie than himfelfe. This qualitie procured unto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient fort, whose cold temper is averse from new enterprises, and therewith all an opinion of great forefight confirmed by every losse received. More particularly, he was gracious among the people, for that he was one of the most grievous oppressors of their subject Provinces; whereby he procured unto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall fuch hatred, as turned it all to their greatloffe. He had ere this beene imployed against the Numidians and wilde Africans, that were more like to Rovers than to Souldiers, in making War. Of those figitive Nations he learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his owne great dishonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which lost not more by his bad condec, than by his malicious counsell, when, having shewed himself an unworthie Captain, he betook himselse to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Histories, satemperate man; and one that studied how to preserve the League betweene Carthageand Rome: In which regard, how well he deferved of his owne Countrie, it will appeare hereafter show beneficiall he was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his present voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necofficie of accepting, upon hard conditions, that peace which hee thence-forth com-

had neither beene carefull in trayning his Mariners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with stout fellowes. He thought, that the same of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the unexpert Romans give way: forgetting, that rather the refiftleffe force of tempests, than any other strength of opposition, had made them to forfake the seas. Yet in one thing he had either conceived aright, or else was sent forth well instructed. It was his purpose, first of all to faile to Eryx, and there to disch arge his ships of their lading: and having thus lightned himselfe, he meant to take aboord some part of the Land-armie, together with Amilear himselfe, by whose helpe hee doubted not, but that he should be able to make his enemie repent of his new adventure to Sea. This was a good course, if it could have been eperformed. But Catulus used all possible diligence, to prevent the execution of this defigne: not because he was informed of the enemies Dur. pose, but that he knew it to be the best for them, & for that he seared no danger so great. ly, as to encounter with Amilear. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the seas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was discried; yet he rather chose to fight with the enemie, that had the winde of him, than to fuffer his convoy to passe along to Eryx upon unlikely hope of better opportunity in the future. All that Hanno should have done, Catulus had performed. He had carefully exercised his men in Rowing; he had lightned his Gallies of all unnecessarie burthens; and he had taken abourd the chorce men of the Roman Land-souldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the first encounter were utterly broken and defeated, having fiftie of their Gallies stemmed and sunke, 10 and feventy taken, wherein were few leffe than tenthousand men, that were all made prisoners: the rest, by a sudden change of winde, escaping to the Ile of Hieronesia.

The state of Carthage, utterly discouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to resolve. Meanes to repaire their sleete in any time there were none left: their best men of warre by Sea were consumed; and Amilear, upon whose valour and judgement the honour and fafety of the Common-weale rested, was now surrounded by his enemies in Szcil, where he could not be relieved. In this extremity, they make dispatch unto Amilear himselfe, and authorize him to take what course should feeme best unto his excellent wisedome, leaving all conclusions to his election and sole counfaile.

Amilear, whom no adverfitie, accompanied with the leaft hope or possibilitie of recoverie had ever vanquished, looking over every promise, true or false, that the present time could make him, (forto attend any thing from the future he was not able) relolved to make triall, whether his necessitie might be compounded upon any reasonable terms. He therefore fent to Luctatius the Consull an overture of peace: who considering it well, gathered so many arguments from the present povertie of the Roman State, wasted beyond expectation in the former warre, that he willingly hearkened unto it. So, in conclusion, an accord was made, but with provision, That it should hold none otherwise, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allow-

The conditions were: First, that the Carthaginians should clearely abandon the Isle of Sicil. Secondly that they should never undertake upon Hieron King of Syracufe, nor invade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they should set at libertie, and send back into Italie, all the Romans, whom they held prisoners, without ransom. Lastly, that they should pay unto the Romanstwo thousand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirteen hundred and twentie thousand crownes: the same to be delivered within twenty years next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were northroughly approved but ten Commissioners were sent into Sicil, to make perfect the agreement. These Commissions ners added a thousand talents to the former sum; and required a shorter time of painters. Further also they tooke order, that the Carthugineans should not only depart out of Sicil it felfe, but should also with-draw their Companies our of all other Hands between it and Italie, renouncing their whole innerest therein. Such was the end of the first Purick marre , that had lasted about twenty four years without intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by fight or shipwrack; 2bout seven hundred Quinquiremes; and the Carthaginians about five hundred the greatnels of which losses, doth serve to prove the greatness both of these two Cities, and of the War it selfe; wherein I hold good the judgement of Polybius, That the Romans, in generall, did shew themselves the braver Nation; and Amilear, the most worthie Captaine.

CHAP. 2. S. I.

He Romans having partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicil, and all the little Hands thereunto adjacent gave them rather meanes and leifure to help themselves in a following war, than cause to hold themselves contented with the present peace. It is an ancient and true rule, 2 nod leges a villoribus dicuntur, accipiuntur a vielis; That lawes are given by the Conquerors, and received of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answer that was made unto them, by one of the Privernates; or else had forgotten to followir, in this weightie businesse. For when one of Privernum, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the cause of his Citie, was demanded by a Senator, what geace the Romans might hope for, or affure themselves of if they quitted their present advantage over them; he answered in these words, Si bouam dederition, & fidam & perpetuam; si malam, hand disturnam; If the peace be good and faithfull that you give su, it will be perpetuall; if it beall, then of little continuance. To this answer the Senare, at that time gave such approbation, that it was faid, Viri & liberi vocem auditam; ancrede poffet, ullum pofulum, aut hominem deniq; in ea conditione, cujus cum poeniteat, diutim quam necesse sit mansurum? that it was the speech of a manly, and free man; for who could believe that any people, or indeed any one man, would continue longer in an over-burdened estate than meere neefitie did enforce? Now, if the Romans themselves could make this judgement of hole Nations, who had little else besides their manly resolution, to desend their liberte; firely, they grofly flattered themselves, in presuming, that the Carthaeinians, who mither in power nor in pride, were any way inferiour unto themselves, would sit downe anylonger by the loffe and dishonour received, than untill they could recover their legs, and the strength which had a while failed them, to take revenge. But occasion, by whom (while well entertained) not only private men, but Kings and publike States, have more prevailed, than by any proper proweffe or verme, with-held the tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most searcfully upon Africa, and the Carthaginians themfelves_

For after that the first Punick war was ended, Amilear, leaving Eryx, went to Lilybefrom whence most conveniently the Armie might be transported into Africke: the are of which businesse he committed unto Gestosto whom, as to a man of approved hisficincie, he delivered over his charge. Gefco had an especiall consideration of the great fimmes, wherein Conthoge was indebted unto these Mercenaries; and, withall, of the great disabilitie to make payment. Therefore he rhought it the wifest way, to fend them over (as it were) by handfuls a few at a time, that forthe first might have their dispatch, andbe gone, ere the second or third Companies arrived. Herein he deale providently. for uhad not been hard to perfinade any finall number, lodged within fogreat a Citie & Carthage, unto some such reasonable composition, as the present emprinesse of the common Treasurie did require: fo that the first might have beene friendly discharged, and a good prefident laft umo the fecond and chird, whilest their diffunction had made them unable to recover their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrarie opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armie, fome that would be contented to gratifie the Publique State, by remitting a great part of their owne due: and hoped, by such an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detained the first and second commers; telling them, that they would make an even reckoning with all together. Thus every day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disquieted the Citie, not accustomed unto the like. In this regard it was thought sit, to remove them allto some other place, where they might be lesse troublesome. This must be done by some colourable words of perswasion for their number was already so great, to that it was not safe to offend them too far. Wherefore it is devised, that they should all attend the comming of their fellowes, at Sieca: receiving every one a piece of gold, to be are his charges in the meane while.

This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers began to dislodge; leaving behinde them their wives, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly to fetch away all. when they came back for their pay . But the Carthaginians have no fancie to their returning into the Towne; and therefore compell them to truffe up their fardels, that they might have none occasion left to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they removed with all their goods; and there lay wairing for newes of their fellowes arrivall, and their owne pay. Bufineffe they had none to doe, and therefore might eafily be drawn to muti-20 nie: the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talke was, how rich they should be, when all their money came in; how much would fall to every fingle share; and for how long time the Citie was behind hand with them in reckoning. They were all growne Arithmeticians; and he was thought a man of worth, that could finde most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, even beyond their due. No part of their long service was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promises of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to mind, and so many obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some unordinarie largesse.

Thus the time passeth away, until the whole armie being arrived, and lodged in Sie- 2 ea, Hanno comes thither to cleare the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be made rich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause. So think they all; and affemble themselves to heare what good newes this meffenger had brought; with a full resolution to help his memorie, in case heshould happen to forget any part of the many promises made to them; all which were to be confidered in their Donative. Hanno begins avery formall Oration, wherein he bewails the povertie of Carthage; tels them how great a sum of money is to be paid unto the Romans : reckons up the excessive charges whereat the Common-wealth had been in the late warre; and finally defires them to hold themselves contented with part of their pay, and out of the love which they bare unto the Citie, to remit the rest. Few of them understood his discourse: for the Carthaginian Armie was composed of sundrie Nations, as Gneekes, Africans, Gaules, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others; all of different languages-Yet they stared upon him, & were (as I think) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such as conceived the whole tenor of his speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort he brought; they were all enraged, and fared like mad-men, to that nothing would ferve to appeale them.

derstood their dissonant lowd noyses, than they did his Oration. An Armie collected out of so many. Countries, that have no one language common toall, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred up to mutinie, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Hanno can doe, is to use the helpe of Interpreters and Messengers. But these Interpreters rnistake his meaning; some for want of skill; others of set purpose; and such as deliver his errands in the worst sense, are best believed. Finally, they thinke themselves much abused by the Carchaginians, and resolveto demand their owne in peremptoric terms; at a neerer distance. In this mood they leave Sicas, and march as farre as Tunio, that is within a very little of Carthage, and there they incampe.

Now begin the Carthaginians to finde their own errour. It is a good rule, Curandum inprimis ne magna injuria fiat Fortibus & miseris.

Have speciall care, that valiant povertie Be not oppress with too great injurie.

Ruthis proud Citie, having neglected the rule, hathalfo beene carelesse in providing to fecure her felfe against the inconvenience that might follow. Shee had suffered the whole multitude, whereunto she was like to give cause of discontent, to joyn it selfe intoone bodie, when the feverall troupes might eafily have bin dispersed: she hath rurned out of her gates the wives, children, and goods of these poore men, which had she reained in shew of kindnesse, she might have used them as Hostages for her own safety; and by imploying a miserable penni-father, in her negotiation with men of War, she hath weakned the reputation of her bravest Captaines, that might best have served to freeher from the threatning danger. Yet likely it is, that Amilear had no defire to be ufed as an instrument in defrauding his owne Souldiers of their wages: especially confidering, that as he best could beare witnesse of their merits, so was he not ignorant; that meanes to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had beene willing thereunto. Hereunto may be added a probable conjecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemie to Amilear, had the boldnesse to impose the blame of his owne wretched counsell, upon the liberall promises made by the Captaines. Amilear therefore did wifely, in suffering those that maligned him, to have the managing of their owne plot, and to deale the cards which themselves had shuffled. This they continue to do as foolishly as they had at first begun. They furnish a market an Tunu for the Souldiers; whom they suffer to buy what they lift, and at what price they lift. They fend ever and anon some of their Senatours into the Campe; who promise to latisfie all demands, as farre forth as it should be possible. And thus by shifting from one extreme to another, they make the Souldiers understand, into what seare the Citic was driven; which cannot choose but add much insolencie to the passions alreadie stir-

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the Army. which thereupon growes wife, and finding the feafon fit, labours to make a great harvest. Money must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many have lost their horses in publike service of the State. The State shall pay for them. They had lived some yeares, by making hard shift, without receiving their allowance of victuals from Enthage. If they had lived, they wanted not meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Wasit not all one, whether the ships did bring in provision, or their Captaine direct them where to fetch it . But this would not serve. They said that they had beene formetimes driven to buy; and that (fince they could not remember how much, orat what rate they bought) they would be paid for their provision during the whole time, and according to the dearest price that wheat had borne, whilest the Warre lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiners; who might easily have been satisfied with farre leffe charges, and far more honour, by receiving their due at the first. But now they make noend of craving. For whileft the Carthaginians are perplexed about this Corn-monie; the Souldiers have devised many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater fun of money, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could be found ofthese controversies which daily did multiplie, it was thought convenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicil, should be chosen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie condescended, and made choice of Gefpartly out of good liking to him, who had shewed himselfe at all times a friendly man to them, and carefull of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africke: partly out of a diflike which they had conceived of Amilear; for that he had not visited them in all this busic time. So Gesco comes among them; and, to please them the better, comes not without money: which might give better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. He calls unto him first of all the Captains, and then the several Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had passed; advising them temperately concerning the prelent; and exhorting them to continue their love unto the State, which had long entertained them, and would needs alwaies be mindefull of their good fervices. After this he began to put hand to his purfe, offering to give them their whole pay in hand; and then after to confider of other reckonings at a more convenient time. This had bin well accepted, and might have ferved to bring all to a quiet paffe, if two feditious ring-leaders of the multitude had not flood against it.

There was in the Campe one Spendim, a sturdie fellow, and audacious, but a slave : that in the late war had fled from a Roman, whom he ferved, and therefore flood in feare lest he should be delivered back to his Master; at whose hands he could expect no leffe, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could finde no better way to prolone his owne life, than by raising such troubles as might serve to with-draw men from care to of private matters, and make his owne restitution impossible, were his Master neverso importunate. With Spendius there affociated himselfe one Matho, an hote-headed man. that had beene fo forward in stirring up the tumult, as he could not choose but feare, lest his owne death should be made an example, to deterre others from the like seditious behaviour. This Matho deales with his Countrimen the Africans; telling them, that they were in far worse condition, than either the Gaules, the Greekes, the Spaniards, or any forreine mercenaries. For (faith he) Thefeour companions have no more to doe, than to receive their wages, and so get them gone: but we that are to stay behinde in Africa, shall he called to another manner of accompt, when we are left alone; so that we shall have cause to will that we had returned home beggars, rather than loaden with the mony, which (lit- 20) tle though it be) shall breake our backes. Tee are not ignorant, how tyrannically those our haughty masters of Carthage doe reigne over us. They thinke it reasonable, that our lives and goods should be at their disposition; which they have at other times bin accustomed to take from us even without apparent cause, as it were to declare their soveraignty: what will they now doe, seeing that we have demeaned our selves as freemen, and bin bold to set a good face on the matter, demanding our own, as others have done? Tee all doe know that it were a very shame for us, if having bin as forward in every danger of war, as any other men we should now stand quaking like slaves, and not dare to open our mouths when others take libertie to require their due. This not with standing ye may assure your selves, that we are like to be taught better manners, as soone as our fellowes are gone: in regard of whom a they are content to [hadow their indignation with a good but a forced count enance. Let us therefore be wise, and consider that they hate and feare us: their hatred will shew it selfe when their feare is once past: unlesse we now take our time, and whilst we are the stronger, enfeeble them so greatly that their hatred shal not be able to do us wrong. All their strength consisteth in money, wherewithall they have hired others against us, and us against others. At the present they have neither money nor friends. Thebest armie that ever served them, whereof we are no small part, lies at their gates, ready to helpe us if we be men. A better opportunity cannot be expected; for wereour swords once drawne, all Africk would rise on our side. As for the Carthaginians, whither can they send for helpe? The case it selfe is plain: but we must quickly resolve. Either we must prevent the diligence of Gesco, by incensing A these Gaules and Spaniards, and procuring them to draw blood; or else it behovethus to please our good Masters, by joining with them against our fellowes, year by offering to forgive unto them all our wages, if so (peradventure) they may be mon to forgive us, or not overcruelly to punish our faults committed. He is most worthily a wretched slave, that neither hath care to winne his Masters love, nor the courage to attempt his owne liberty.

By fuch perfivations Matho winnes the African fouldiers to his owne purpose. They are not now so greedie of mony, as of quarrell; which he that seeketh will not misse to find. When Gesco therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demands, for horses and victuals, to some other more convenient time; they breake into great outrage, and say, that they will have all, even all at once, and sthat out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Armie flocke together about Matho and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting to add more fuell to the fire alreadie blazing. Matho and Spendius are the only mento whom the Souldiers will hearken: if any other stand up to make a speech, a showre of stones, stying about his eares, puts him to silence, that he shall never afterwards speake word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say: enough hath beene said alreadie by those good spokesmens that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can be heard, save only Throw,

Now the rebellion begins to take forme. Matho and Spendius are chosen Captains: who, followed by a desperate crue of Russians, will suffer no man to make his owne neace, but pursue their owne ends, under faire pretence of the common cause. All which notwithstanding, Gesco is not wanting to the good of his Countrie, but adventures himfelse upon their furie. One while he deales with the Captaines, and other principall men; taking them by the hand, and giving gentle words: another while he workes with the severall Nations; putting them all in hope of their own hearts defire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so sullen as the Africans: indeed none of them had so good cause. They require him peremptorily to give them their owne, and not to feed them with words. The truth is, that they are not fo covetous as they feeme: but will be more glad of anill answer, than of a good payment. This is more than Gefco knowes: he fees not that Matho hath any more than bare words to bestow upon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconfiderate heat, he tels them, That they may doe well, if they hand in want of money, to feeke it of their Captaine Matho. This is enough. Shall he hoth defraud them and deride them . They stay no longer, but lay violent hands upon the treasure that he had brought; yea upon him also, and all that are with him: as intending to take this in part of payment, and, for the rest, to take another course. Matho and spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their fellowes begin to grow calme, by his faire language: wherefore they cast into bonds both him, and all the Carthayinians that they can finde; that so the Armie may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treason. After this followes open war. Matho folicites all Africk, and his Embassadors are every where well entertained. Neither is it needfull to ufeperswasion: the very same of this rebellion sufficeth to draw the whole countrie into in Now must the Carthaginians be plagued for those oppressions, with which they have plagued others. It is true that adversitie hath never beene untold of her errours: and as his ever affured to heare her owne, fo commonly with her owne she undergoes those ofother men. The Africans finding the Carthaginians hang under the wheele, tell them boldly, that their Impositions were mercilesse; that they took from them the one halfe oftheir corne; that they doubled their tributes in all things elfe; and that they inflicted pupon their vassals the greatest punishment for the least offences. These cruelties the Carthaginians themselves have forgotten: but the people, that have suffered so much, retain all in perfect memorie. Wherefore not only such as can beare Armes are readie to doe fervice in this great Commotion; but the very women bring forth their Jewels, and other ornaments, offering all to fale for the maintenance of fo just a quarrell. By this great forwardnesse, and liberall contribution, Matho and Spendim are supplied with a strong aide of three score and ten thousand Africans: and are moreover surnished with money, not onely to fatisfie the present appetite of their men; but sufficient to continue the war begun, though it should be of long endurance.

§. I I. Divers observations upon this war with the Mercenaries.

†. I.

Of Tyrannie, and how Tyrants are faine to use the helpe of Mercenaries.

Ere let us rest a while, as in a convenient place, whence we may take a prospect of the subject, over which we travell. Behold a tyrannicall Citie, persecuted by her owne Mercenaries with a deadly war. It is a common thing, as being almost necessaries, that a tyrannic should be upheld by mercenarie forces: it is common that Mercenaries should be false: and it is common that all warre made against Tyrants, should be exceeding full of hate and crueltie. Yet we feldome heare, that ever the ruine of a tyrannic is procured or sought by those that were hired to maintain the power of it: and seldome or never doe we reade of any war that hath been prosecuted with such inexpiable latted, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call Tyrannie, is, A violent form of government, not respecting the good of the sub jett, but only the pleasure of the Commander. I purposely forbear to say, that it is the unjust rule of one over many: for very truely doth Cleon in Thucydides tell the Athenians, that their dominion over their subjects, was none other, than a meere tvrannie; though it were fo, that they themselves were a great Citie, and a popular estate. Neither is it peradventure greatly needfull, that I should call this forme of commanding violent: fince it may well and eafily be conceived, that no man willingly performs obedience to one regardlesse of his life and welfare; unlesse himselse be either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of love. The practice of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremitie: for some Lords are more genrle than others, to their very flaves; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne advantage. Nevertheleffe, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it selfe, unto notice of the diffe- 10 rence which might be found between the worth of feverall men; it is commonly feene. that the tafte of sweetnesse, drawne out of oppression, hat h so good a rellish, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not fuffer it to be restrained with any limits of respect. Why should he seek out bounds to prescribe unto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation . It is much that he hath gotten by extorting from fome few: by fparing none, he should have riches in goodly abundance. He hath taken a great deale from every one: but every one could have spared more. He hath wrung all their purses, & now he hathenough but (as Covetouinefle is never fatisfied) he thinkes that all this is too little for a flock, though it were indeed a good yearly In-come. Therefore he deviseth new tricks of robbery, and 20 is not better pleased with the gains, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this and he knowes it well: but he thinkes by crueltieto change hatred into feare. So hemakes it his exercise, to torment and murder all whom he suspecteth: in which course, if he suspect none unjustly he may be said to deale craftily; but if Innocencie be not safe, how can all this make any Conspirator to stand infeare, fince the Traitor is no worse rewarded, than the quiet man? Wherefore he can think upon none other fecuritie, than to dif-arm all his Subjects; to fortifie himselse within some strong place; and, for defence of his Person and State to hire as many luftie Souldiers as shal be thought sufficient. These must not be of his owne Countrie: for if not every one, yet some one or other may chance to have a feeling of the publike miserie. This considered, he allures unto him a desperaterable of strangers, the most unhonest that can be found; such as have neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be careful to support him, by whose only favour they are maintained Now lest any of these, either by detestation of his wickednesse, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward than he doth give, should be drawn to turn his sword against the Tyrant himselse: they shall all be permitted to doe as he doth; to rob, to ravish, to murder, and to satisfie their owne appetites, in most outrageous maner; being thought fo much the more affured to their Mafter, by how much the more he fees them grow hateful to all men elfe. Confidering in what age, and in what language I write; I must be faine to say, that these are not dreams: though some Englishman perhaps that were unacquainted with Historie, lighting upon this leafe, might suppose this discourse to be but little better. This is to shew, both how tyrannie growes to standing need of mercenarie Souldiers, and how those Mercenaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmly affured unto the Tyrant.

†. II.

That the Tyrannie of a Citie over her Subjetts is worse, than the tyrannie of one man: and that a tyrannicall Citie must likewise use mer cenarie Souldiers.

TOw concerning the tyranny wherewith a Citie or State oppresseth her subjects it may appear some waies to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in ma ny things it is more intolerable. A Citie is jealous of her Dominion; but not (asis one man) fearfull of her life: the lesse need hath she therefore to secure her selfe by cal eltie. A Citie is not luxurious in confuming her treasures, and therefore needs the less to plucke from her subjects. If warre, or any other great occasion, drive her to necessi tie of taking from her Subjects more than ordinarie summes of money; the same neces fitie makes either the contribution eafie, or the taking excusable. Indeed no wrongs at To grievous & hatefull, as those that are insolent. Remember (faith Caligula the Empero to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may doe what I lift, and to whom I lift: these words were accounted horrible, though he did her no harme. And Juvenal reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruel Roman Dame upon her flaves, that whileft she was whipping them, she painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and used all signes of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grievances wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all fense of indignitie: likely it is, that they will not extremely hatcher, although defire of libertic make them wearie of her Empire. In these respects it is not needfull, that she should keep a Guard of licentious cut-throats, and maintaine them in all villany, as a Dionyfius or Agathocles must doe : her owne Citizens are able to terrefie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselves, may serve to prove, That a Citie is scarce able to deserve thename of a Tyrannesse, in the proper sig-

of the History of the World.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appeare, that the miseries, wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his people, are not so heavie, as the burdens imposed by a cruell Citie. Not without some appearance of truth, it may be faid, that Lust, and many other private passions. areno way incident to a Citie or Corporation. But to make this good, we shall have need to use the helpe of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lascivious, when Cato was faine to rise and leave the Theater, to the end, that the reverend regard of his gravity might not hinder the people from calling for a hew of naked Courtifans, that were to be brought upon the open stage? By common practice, and generall approved custome, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the private vertue or vice of any one man, nor by metaphyficall abstraction of the univerfall from the fingular; or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compoundded. If ay therefore, (as I have faid elsewhere) That it were better to live under one pernicious Tyrant, than under many thousands. The reasons proving this, are too many to stdowne, but few may suffice. The defires of one man, how inordinate soever, if they cannot be fatisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to fearch all corners; his humour may be found, and foothed; age or good advice, yea, or fome unexpected accident may reforme him; all which failing, yet is there hope, that his successour may prove better.

Many Tyrants have beene changed into worthy Kings: and many have ill used their ll gotten Dominion, which becomming hereditary to their posterity, hath grown into themost excellent forme of Government, even a lawfull Monarchy. But they that live under a tyrannicall Citie, have no fuch hope: their Mistresseis immortall, and will not lacken the reines, untill they be pulled out of her hands, and her owne mouth receive thebridle of a more mightier Chariotter. This is wofull: yettheir present sufferings make them leffe mindefull of the future. New flies, and hungry ones, fall upon the fame fore, out of which others had already fucked their fill. A new Governour comes yearely among them, attended by all his poore kindred and friends, who meane not to returne home empty to their hives, without a good lading of waxe and hony. These slie into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with every mans wealth, or what soever else, in all the Province, is worthy to be defired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his fears: becomming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he seareth most. To grow imacquaintance with these masterfull guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an mdleffelabour, (yet it must be undergone) and such as every one hath not means to goe bout: but were this effected, what availeth it? The love of one Governour is purchased with gifts: the Successor of this man, he is more loving than could be wished, in respect ofafaire Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary faction at home, a bitter enemy to both his fore-goers, who seekes the ruine of all that have beene mward with them. So the miseries of this tyranny are not simple, but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities oficivillimarre. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or, of Recoverze, against extorting Magistrates: yet we finde, that it served not wholly to retraine their Provinciall Governours; who prefuming on the favour of their owne Citilens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold, in their Provinces, to worke these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for seare of ladgement. If the subjects of Rome ground under such oppressions, what must we think of those that were Vassals unto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthensome Pppp tributes:

tributes; they loved not to heare; that their Empire was grievous; they condemned many noble Citizens for having beene ill Governours. At Carthage all went quite contranie: the rapines newly devided by one Magistrate, served as Presidents to instruct another; every man resolved to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne; and he was ther; every man resolved to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne; and he was the da notable Statesman, whose robberies had beene such, as might affoord a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice are not extant: the government of Verres the Roman in Sicil, that is lively set out by Tullie, may serve to informe us, what was the demeanour of these Punick Rulers, who stood in scare of no such condemnation, as Verres under-went. By prosecuting this discourse, I might inferre a more generall Proposition; That a Citie cannot governe her subject Provinces to so middly as a King: but it is enough to have shewed, That the tyranny of a Citie is far more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Sutable to the crueltie of fuch Lords, is the hatred of their subjects: and againe, sutable to the hatred of the subjects, is the jealousie of their Lords. Hence it followed, that, in wars abroad, the Carthaginians durst use the service of African souldiers; in Africk it selfe they had rather be beholding to others, that were farther fetcht. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick war, shift his Mercenaries out of their own counpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick war, shift his Mercenaries out of their own counpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick war, shift his Mercenaries out of their own countries; It Afri in Hispania, Hispanian Africa, melior procul ab domo suturus uters; miles, velut mutuis pignoribus obligati sipendia facerent; That the Africans might serve in Spain, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them like to prove the better Souldiers, the farther to they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutual pledges. It is disputable, I consess, whether these African and Spanish hirelings, could properly be termed Mercenaries: for they were subject unto Carthage, & carried into the field, not only by reward, but by dutie. Yet seeing their dutie was no better than enforced, and that it was not any love to the State, but meer desire of gain, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand upon propriety of a word, but hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercenaries.

The dangers growing from the use of mercenarie Souldiers, and forrain Auxiliaries.

He extreme danger, growing from the imploiment of fuch Souldiers, is well obferved by Machiavel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serve, than to those against whom they serve. They are seditious, unfaithful disobedient, devourers, and destroyers of all places and Countries, whereintothey are drawne; as being held by no other bond, than their own commoditie. Yea, that which is most fearfull among such hirelings, is, that they have often, and in time of greatest extremity, not only refused to fight, in their defence, who have entertained them, but revolted unto the contrarie part; to the utter ruine of those Princes and States that have trusted them. These Mercenaries (faith Machiavel) which filled all Italie when Charls the eight of France did passe the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King wonthe Realm of Naples with his Buckler without a Sword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by Queen Joane of Naples, abandoned her service on the sudden, and forced her to put her self into the hands of the king of Aragon. Like unto his father was Francis Sforza, the first of that race, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his flaves,e ven with the very fame armie which themselvs had levied for their own defence. But Lo dowick Sforza, the son of this Francis, by the just judgement of God, was made a memo rable example unto posterity, in losing his whole estate by the trechery of such faithless Mercenaries, as his own father hadbin. For, having waged an armie of Switzers, and committed his Dutchie, together with his person, into their hands, he was by them delivered up unto his enemie the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loche. unto his dving day.

The like inconvenience is found, in using the helpe of forreigne Auxiliaries. We see, that when the Emperor of Constantinople had hired ten thousand Turks against he neighbour Princes; he could never, either by persuasion or force, set them agains on the sea upon Asia side; which gave beginning to the Christian servitude, that soon ass followed. Alexander, the fon of Cassander, Sought aide of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, slue the same Alexander, who had invited him, and made himselfe King of Macedon. Syracon the Turke was called into Egypt by Sanar that Soldan, against his Opposite: but this Turke did settle himselfe so surely in Egypt, that Saladine his successor became Lord thereof; & of all the holy Land, soon after. What need we look about for examples of this kind? Every Kingdome, in effect, can furnish us. The Britaines drew the Saxons into this our Countrie; and Mac Murrough drew the some some looks of those two kingdomes.

Against all this may be alledged, the good successe of the united Provinces of the Neiherlands, using none other than such kinde of Souldiers, in their late warre. Indeed thele Low-countries have many goodly and strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthie, industrious, and valiant in their kinde. They are stout Sea-men, and therein is their excellencie; neither are they bad at the defence of a place well fortified: but in openfield they have seldome bin able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessity therefore compelled them to feeke helpe abroad: and the like necessity made them forbeare to ame any great numbers of their owne. For, with money raised by their Trade, they maintained the Warre: and therefore could ill spare unto the Pike and Musket, those hinds, that were of more use in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they sped well. Surely they sped as ill as might be, whilst they had none other than mermarie Souldiers. Many fruitlesse attempts, made by the Prince of Orenge, can witnesse it and that brave Commander Count Lodowicke of Nassau ; felt, to his griefe , in his muit from Græningham; when, in the very instant that required their service in fight, his Mercenaries cried out aloud for money, and fo ranne away. This was not the onely time, when the hired Souldiers of the States, have either fought to hide their cowardize under a shew of greedinesse; or at least, by meere coverousnesse, have ruined in one hourethe labour of many moneths. I will not stand to prove this by many examples: for they themselves will not deny it. Neither would I touch the honour of Monfurthe Duke of Anjou, brother to the French King; fave that it is folly to conceale what all the world knowes. He that would lay open the danger of forraine Auxiliaries, mdeth no better patterne. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselves lords over those, to whom they lend their suctour: but where shall we meet with such mother as this Monfieur, who, for his protection promifed, being rewarded with the lordship of the Countrie, made it his first worke, to thrust by violence a galling yoake won the peoples necke? Well, he lived to repent it, with griefe enough. Even whilest hewas counterfeiting unto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imagimicforrow for the poore Burghers of Antwerpe, as verily believing the Towne to be impifed and wonne; the death of the Count S. Aignan, who fell over the wall, and the Cannon of the Citie, discharged against his owne troupes, informed him better what had hapned; shewing, that they were his own French who stood in need of pittty. Then was his feigned pallion changed into a very bitter anguish of minde, wherein, micing his breaft, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Helis, mon Dieu, que veux infaire de moy ? Also, my God, what wilt thoudow with me? So the affaires of the Nethers lands will not ferve to prove, that there is little danger in using mercenarie Souldiers, or thehelpe of forraine Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding, they were obedient unto neeffice, and fought helpe of the English, Scots, and French: wherein they did wifely, and Mospered For when there was in France a King, partaker with them in the same danger; when the Queen of England refused to accept the Soveraignty of their Country, which they offered, yet being provoked by the Spaniard their enemie, pursued him with contimall war, when the heir of Enoland reigned in Scotland, a King too just and wise (though not ingaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his Neighbours miseries, or to help those that had attempted the conquest of his owne inheritance : then might the Netherlunders very fafely repose confidence in the forces of these their Neighbour-countries. The Souldiers that came unto them from hence, were (to omit any other commendation) ons) not onely regardfull of the pay that they should receive, but well affected unto the that they tooke in hand: or, if any were cold in his devotion, unto the fide wherethe fought, yet was he kept in order, by remembrance of his owne home, where he English would have rewarded him with death, if that his faith had beene corrupted Pppp 2

by the Spaniard. They were therfore trufted with the custodie of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons, the necessitie of the poorer fort was relieved, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helpes, as well as the abilitie of the States could permit. When three luch Princes, reigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintain against the power of a fourth, injurious (or at least so seeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Country of the same religion, and to which they all are lovingly affected then may such a countrie be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other businesse, in hope of like fuccesse. But these circumstances meet so seldome, as it may well hold true in generall: That mercenary and forrain auxiliary forces are no lesse dangerous, than the enemy against whom they are entertained.

That the moderate government of the Romans gave them assurance to use the service of their owne subjects in their wars. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyrannie. which hindrerh the use and benefit of the like moderation.

Ere it may be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to use fervice of other fouldiers in their many great wars, but performed all by their Lown Citizens for ifit were their maner to arm their own subjects, how happed it, that they feared no rebellion; if strangers, how then could they avoid the inconveniences above rehearled? The answer is, That their Armies were compounded usually of their own Citizens, and of the Latines in equall number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of Campanes, Hetrurians, Samnites, or other of their subjects as were either interessed in the quarrell, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times, (though seldome they did imploy so many) ten Roman Legions; agood ftrength, if all other helpe had bin wanting; which served to keepe in good order their fubjects, that were alwayes fewer in the armie than themselves. As for the Latines, if confanguinitie were not a sufficient obligation, yet many priviledges and immunities, which they injoied, made them affured unto the State of Rome: under which they lived almost a libertie, as being bound to little else, than to serve it in war. It is true, that a yoke, howesfie foever, feems trouble for to the neck that hath bin accustomed to freedom. Therfore many people of Italie have taken occasion of severall advantages, to deliver themselves from the Roman Subjection. But still they have bin reclaimed by war, the Authors of rebellion have sharply bin punished, and the people by degrees have obtained such liberty, as made them effeem none otherwise of Rome, than as the common citie of all Italy. Yes, in processe of rime it was granted unto many Cities, and those far off removed, even to Tarfue in Cilicia, where Saint Paul was born, That all the Burgesses should be free of Rome it selfe. This favour was conferred absolutely upon some; upon some, with restraint of giving voyce in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation as was thought fir. Hereunto may be added, that it was their maner, after a great conquest, to release unto their new subjects halfe of their tribute which they had bin wont to pay to their former Lords, which was a ready way to bring the multitude into good liking of their prefent condition; when the review of harder times past, should rather teach them to feareast laple, than to hope for better in the future, by feeking innovation. Neither would ith forgotten, as a special note of the Romans good government, That when some, for their well-deferving have had the offer to be made Citizens of Rome, they have refused itam held themselves better contented with their owne present estate. Wherefore it is no marvell, that Petellia, a Cirie of the Brutians in Italie, chose rather to endure all extre mitie of war, than, upon any condition, to forfake the Romans; even when the Roman themselves had confessed, that they were unable to helpe these their subjects, and there fore willed them to looke to their owne good, as having bin faithfull to the utmost. Su love purchased these mild Governors, without impairing their Majesty thereby. fum of all is they had, of their own, a ftrong Armie; they doubled it by adjoyning the unto the Latines; and they further increased it, as need required, with other help of the own subjects: all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperitie of Rome toll the common good.

of the History of the World. unto their Lords, and consequently, in the establishment or inlargement of Dominion: irmay seeme strange, that the practice of tyranny, whose effects are contrary, hath been fo common in all ages. The like, Iknow, may be faid of all Vice and Irregularity, whatfoever. For it is lesse disficult, (who soever thinke otherwise) and more safe, to keepe the way of Justice and Honestie, than to turne aside from it; yet commonly our passions doe lead us into by-paths. But where Lust, Anger, Feare, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason; the same unruly appetite, either bringeth with it an excuse, or, at least-wife, takethaway all cause of wonder. In tyrannie it is not so: for as much as we can hardly descry the passion, that is of force to infinuate it selfe into the whole tenour of a Goto vernment. It must be confessed, that lawlesse desires have bred many Tyrants: yet so, that these desires have seldome bin hereditary, or long-lasting; but have ended commonly with the Tyrants life, fometimes before his death; by which meanes the government hath bin reduced to a better forme. In fuch cases, the faying of Ariffotle Ariff. polls. G. 12. holds, That tyrannies are of a short continuance. But this doth not satisfie the question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise Tyranny ? Why did the Athenians? Why have many other Cities done the like ? If in respect of their generall good; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the safety of the Weale publique ? If they were led hereunto by any affection; what was that affection wherein so many thousand Citizens, divided and subdivided within themselves by sactions, did all concurre, notwithstanding the much diversity of temper, and the vehemencie of private harred among them ! Doubtleffe, we must be faine to fay, That Tyrannie is, by it felfe, a Vice distinct from others. A Man, we know, is Animal politicum, apreven by Nature, to command, or to obey; every one in his proper degree. Other defires of Mankinde, are common likewise unto brute beasts; and some of them, to bodies wanting sense: but the desire of rule belongeth unto the nobler part of reason; wheremto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are givenby nature not only to Man and Beast, but unto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustenation of their life: as Feare, Anger, Lust, and other affections are likewise naturall, in convenient measure, both unto Mankinde, and to all creatures that have sense, for the shunning or repelling of harme, and seeking after that which is requisite: even so is this defire of ruling or obeying, ingraffed by Nature in the race of Man, and in Man onely as a reasonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a civill forme of Justice. All these in-bred qualities are good and usefull. Neverthelesse, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttony and Drunkennesse, which, in reproach, are called beastly, by an unproper terme : fince they grow from appetites, found in leffe worthy creatures than balls, and are yet not so common in bealts, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions as descend no lower than unto brute beasts, are held lesse vile; and perhaps not without good reason: yet are they more horrible, and punished more grievously, by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more pernicious. But, as no corruption is worse, danof that which is best; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a vice more hurtfull mo Mankinde, than that which issueth from the most noble root, even the depraved Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefes, of which hath beene an old question in dispute, whether be the worse; That all things, or That nothing should belawfull. Of these, a dull spirit, and over-loaden by fortune, with power, whereof tisnotcapable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrary disternet, whose vehemency the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Under the extremity of eiter, no Country isable to subsist: yet the desective dulnesse, that permitteth any hing, will also permit the execution of Law, to which meerenecessity dorn enforce cordinary Magistrate; whereas Tyranny is more active, and pleaseth it selfe in the teeffe, with a false colour of justice. Examples of stupidity, and unaptnesse to rule, renot very frequent, though such natures are every where to be found : for this quality Toubles not it selfe in seeking Empire; or if by some errour of fortune, it encounter rewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding himselfe in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) one friend, or else a wife, is not wanting to supply the desect, which also cruelty oth helpe to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing unknowne, is without a name. yrannie is more bold, and feareth not to be knowne, but would be reputed honouole: for it is prosperum & fælix scelus, a fortunate mischiefe, as long as it can sub-There is no reward or honour (faith Peter Charron) a signed unto those, that know how to increase or preserve humane nature: all honours greatnesse exiches dignities, Empires. now to increase or press. are appointed for those, that know how to afflict, trouble, or destroy it. Casar and Alexander, have un-made and flaine, each of them, more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behinde them. Such is the errour of Mans judgement in valuing things according to the common opinion. But the true name of Tyranny, when it growes to ripenesse, is none other than Feritie: the same that Aristotle saith to be worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeed all other vices, issuing from the paffions incident both to Man and Beaft; no leffe than Perjurie, Murder, Treafon, and the like horrible crimes, exceed in villanie, the faults of Gluttony & Drunken. nesse, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procrustes, and Pityo-10 camptes, that used their bodily force to the destruction of Mankinde, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionysim, and Agathocles, whose mischievous heads were asfifted by the hands of deteftable Ruffians. The fame barbarous defire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie, and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the use of Rule, nor the difference betweene Freemen

The rule of the husband over the wife, and of parents over their children, is naturall. and appointed by God himselfe; so that it is alwayes, and simply, allowable and good. The former of these, is as the dominion of Reason over Appetite; the latter is the whole authoritie, which one Freeman can have over another. The rule of a King is no more, 20 nor none other, than of a common Father over his whole country: which he that knowes what the power of a Father is, or ought to be, knowes to be enough. But there is a greater, and more Masterly rule, which God gave unto Adam, when he said : Have dominion over the fish of the Sea, and over the fowle of the aire, and every living thing that moweth upon the earth: which also he continueth unto Noah and his children, faying, The feare of you, and the dread of you, shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowle of the aire, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the Sea; into your hands are they delivered. He who gave this dominion unto Man, did give also an aptitude to use it. The execution of this power hath fince extended it selfe, over a very great part of Mankinde. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disabilitie to Arif. Pol. 12.63. governe themselves, proves them, according unto Ariftotles doctrine, to be naturally

Yet finde I not in Scripture any warrant to oppresse men with bondage: unlesse the lawfulnesse thereof be sufficiently intimated, where it is said, That a man shall not be punished for the death of a servant, whom he hath slaine by correction, if the servant live a day or two, because he is his money or else by the captivity of the Midianits b girls, which were made bond-flaves, and the Sanctuary had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doubtlessethe custome hath beene very ancient: for Noah laid this curse upon Canaan, that he should be a servant of servants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, amongother gifts, men-fervants and maid-fervants, which were none other than flaves. Christian Religion is faid to have abrogated this old kinde of fervilitie: but furely they are deceived that think fo. Saint Paul defired the liberty of Onesimus, whom he had won unto Christ: yet wrote for this unto Philemon by way of request, craving it as abenefit, not urging it as a dutie. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the fame Saint Paul giveth unto servants: Let every man abide in the same calling wher in he was called: art thou called being a servant? care not for it, but if thou maist be made free use it rather. It is true, that Christian religion hath procured liberty unto many; not onely in regard of pietie, but for that the Christian Masters stood in fear of being discovered by their slaves, unto the persecuters of religion. Mahomet likewise, by giving libertie to his followers, drew many unto his impietie: but whether he forbade it, as unlawfull, unto his sectators, to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tels lave that by the practice of the Tarki and Moores, it seemes he did not. In England we had many bond-servants, until the time of our last civill wars; and I think that the Lawes concerning Villenage are still in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaves were made free, which force, of which the latest are the inarpert. And how, ince have of great use and service, there are growned a rabble of Rogues, Cutpurses, and mintate the unspeakeable goodnesse, rather than the inaccessible majestie, with both of which him the inaccessible majestie, with both of ther the like trades; flaves in Nature, though not in Law.

But whether this kinde of dominion be lawfull, or not; Aristotle hath well proved that it is naturall. And certainly, we finde not fuch a latitude of difference in a creature, as in the nature of man; wherein (to omit the infinite distance in estate of the elect & reprobate) the wifest excell the most foolish, by far greater degree, than the most foolish of men doth surpasse the wisest of beasts. Therefore when Commiseration hath given way to Reason, we shall finde, that Nature is the ground even of Masterly power, and of servile obedience, which is thereto correspondent. But it may be truely said, that fome countries have substitted long without the use of any servilitie; as also it is true, that some countries have not the use of any tame cattell. Indeed the affections which uphold civill rule, are (though more noble) not fo fimply needfull, unto the fuftentation either of our kinde, as are Luft, and the like; or of every one, as are hunger and thirst; which notwithflanding are the lowest in degree. But where most vile and servile dispositions have liberty to shew themselves begging in the streets, there may we more justly wonder, how the dangerous toile of sea-faring men can finde enough to undertake them, than how the swarme of idle vagabonds should increase, by accesse of those, that are weary of their own more painfull condition. This may suffice to prove, that in Mankinde there is found, ingraffed even by Nature, a defire of absolute dominion: whereunto the generall custome of Nations doth subscribe; together with the pleasure which most men take in flatterers, that are the basest of slaves.

This being so, we finde no cause to marvell, how Tyranny hath been so rife in all ages, and practifed, not only in the fingle rule of some vicious Prince, but ever by consent of whole Cities and Estates: since other vices have likewise gotten head, and borne a generall fway, notwithstanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that have used well the inferiour Passions: how then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not be disordered ? in the government of wife and children, some are utterly carelesse, and corrupt all by their dull connivencie: others, bymasterly rigour, hold their owne bloud under condition of slavery. To been good Governour is a rare commendation: and to preferre the Weal publike above all respects what foever is the Vertue justly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue many ages affoord not many examples. Hellor is named by Aristotle as one of them; and deservedly, if this praise bedue to extraordinary height of fortitude, used in defence of a mans owne Country. But if we confider, that a love of the generall good cannot be perfect, without reference unto the fount aine of all goodnesse: we shall finde, that no morall vertue, how great soever, an, by it felfe, deserve the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we must fearch the Scriptues, for patternes hereof; fuch as David, Josaphat, and Josias were. Of Christian Kings, if there were many such, the world would soone behappy. It is not my purpose to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where isdue, or by preferring a leffe excellent. But he that can finde a King religious, and realous in Gods cause, without enforcement, either of adversitie, or of some regard of fate; a procurer of the generall peace and quiet; who not only ufeth his authority, but addes the travell of his eloquence, in admonishing his Judges to doe justice; by the vigorous influence of whose Government, civilitie is infused, even into those places, that have been the dens of savage Robbers and Cut-throats; one that hath quite abolished a lavish Brehon Law, by which a whole Nation of his subjects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher vertue and wisedome doth make the praise not only of Nobility and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the bloud, the wives, and the goods of those that are under his power, together with a world of chiefe commendations belonging uto some good Princes, to appeare lesse regardable: he, I say, that can find such a King, fideth an example, worthy to adde unto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Under fuch a King, it is likely, by Gods bleffing, that a Land shall flourish, with forease of Trade, in Countries before unknowne; that Civility and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen Countries; and that the happinesse of his sublects, shall cause the Nations sarre off removed, to wish him their Soveraigne. I need not adde hereunto, that all the actions of fuch a King, even his bodily exercifes, doe parake of vertue; fince all things to nding to the preservation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who fixing his contemplation upon God, feeketh how to which himselfe is indued, as farre as humane nature is capable) doeal so belong to the utherance of that common good, which he procureth. Left any man should think mee ansported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bounds of reason; I adde hereunto, that fuch a King is nevertheleffe a man, must dye, and may erre: yet wisdome and fame shall fet him free, from error, and from death, both with and without the heln of time. One thing I may not omit, as a fingular benefit (though there be many other befides) redounding unto this King, as the fruit of his goodnesse. The people that live under a pleasant yoke, are not onely loving to their Soveraigne Lord, but free of courage, and no greater in muster of men, than of stout fighters, if need require: whereas on the contrary, he that ruleth as over flaves, shall be attended in time of necessity, by flavish minds, neither loving his person, nor regarding his or their own honour. Cowards may be furious, and flaves outragious, for a time: but among spirits that have once yeeldedunto flavery univerfally it is found true, that Homer faith, God bereaveth a man of halfe his to vertue that day when he casteth him into bondage.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonably have spoken, in the generall discourse of Government: but where so lively an example of the calamity following a tyrannicall rule, and the use of Mercenaries, the reupon depending, did offer it selfe, as is this present businesse of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectuall, than being barely delivered, as out of a common place.

How the war against the Mercenaries was diversly managed by Hanno and Amilcar, with 20 variable successe. The bloudy counsels of the Mercenaries; and their finall destruction.

Eing now to returne unto those Mercenaries, from whom I have thus farre digrefied, I cannot readily finde, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pre-*unica is seased tend, that they seeke their wages already due; so that they are neither Mercenaries, nor in the greatbay Mutiners. Had they all been subjects unto Carthage, then might they justly have been that enters to-wards Carthage, termed Rebels: but Spendiss, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegiance to that State, which they endevoured to subvert. Wherefore I will the Promontory of Apollo. At borrow the name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercenaries, as Polybanal.,

These using the advantage of their present strength, besieged * urica and Hippagreta, called Porto Fewina, or sugara, Cities of great importance, as being feated upon the western Haven of Carthage, where sans themselves, it is divided by a neck of land; Hippagreta standing inwards upon the great Lake, this GarelMaba. No further out upon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Tunis abandoned, which lay fitly the town it selfe to hinder the Carthaginians from passing up into the countrie: for Matho and Spendim the place where wanted not men to follow the war in all parts at once.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this unexpected perill, any man may concalled Magacha- ceive. But the businesse it selfe awakes them hastily. They are hardly prest on all sides; res. It was very ver. It was very and therefore travelled their brains to the uttermost, how to shake off these furious dogs ancient, and and therefore travelled their brains to the uttermost, how to shake off these furious dogs built beforecar- from their shoulders, who, sometimes by night, sometimes by day, came unto the very thage, taith Site walls of their Citie. In this exigent, Hanno was made their Generall: who failed not in fhedbefore Car- his accustomed diligence of making all good preparation: but had gotten together whatthagewas set up, soever was needfull, as well to relieve a Town besieged, as to batter and assaile any place defended against him. With these provisions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came throwne down to Utica, fo fuddenly, that the enemies, as men surprised, for sook their Trenches, and by the Romans in the third Pu- retired themselves unto a rising piece of woody ground, where they might be safe aniche warre. Fa- gainst the violence of his beasts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Numidians, mousit was by the death of ca. whose custome was, after any losse, to flie two or three whole daies journy off; present the deautoite souther the Town, to shew himselfe after this his victory. But these good fellowes, a who heldit a- gainst whom he was to war, had learned of Amilear, to retire and to fight again, many gainst carjat. 1. Emerging times in one day, as need required. Therefore as foon as they perceived, that he knew Divine, was Bi- not how to use a victory; they affailed their own Camp, and with great saughter, draw shop thereof in theor thereof in the Canthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themselves within utica; and got pot fericite Arian, session of all the store that Hanno had brought for the reliefe of the Towne. This ba who lived all the time of that beginning Hanno followed with futable indifference: lofing the benefit of many fairt opportunities, and fuffering the enemies to take possession of all the entrance from Car hath written thage to the firm land.

The Carthaginians perceiving this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their shere-anchor; sending to the field their great Captaine Amilear, whom they furnished with ten thousand foot of supply, and seventy Elephants. Amilear had worke enough to doe, before he should be able to meet with the enemy upon equall ground. For, besides other places of advantage that the Mercenaries had occupied, Hanno had fuffered them to win the onely bridge, by which the River Macra, or Bagradas, was passable unto these, that were to travell into the Continent. This River had not many foords, nor those easie for a fingle man to get over: but upon them all was kept such guard, as gave to Amilear little hope of prevailing in feeking way by force. As for the Bridge it felfe, Matho and his followers were there lodged: and had there built a town, wherein to lye commodiously, intentive only to the custody thereof. But Amilear had observed, that the very mouth of Bagradas used to be sometimes cloyed with sand and gravell, that was driven in by certaine customary winds, and could not be driven out againe, by force of that flow river, till the wind failing, or changing, fuffered the weight of the waters to dif-burden their channell. Hereof he made use; and taking his opportumite passed the River, contrary to all expectation, either of the enemy, or of his owne

There was no need to bid Spendim looke about him, when once it was heard, that Amilear was come over Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the newes: knowing that they were no longer to deale with the improvident gravity of Hanno, but with an able spirit, even with their owne Master in the Art of Warre, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this feare was foone changed into prefumption; when more than fifteen thousand of their owne fociety, were come from utica, and other ten thousand from the guard of the Bridge. Their Armie was farre greater, than that of Amilear; and they were, intheir owne judgement, the better men; upon which confidence, they resolved to charge him on all sides, and beat him downe, in despight of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attended upon him, watching for some advantage, and still exhorting one another to play the men, and give the onset. Especially they that followed him in the Reare, had a great minde to begin the fight; whereunto their promptnesse was such as tooke from them their former circumspection. Amilcarheld his way towards the Bridge, keeping himselfe on plaine grounds, that were fittelt for the service of his Elephants, which he placed in front of his Armie. Neither made heshew of any desire to fight, but suffered the rashnesse of his enemies to increase, till it hould breake into some disorder. At length perceiving, that with more boldnesse than good heed, they followed him so neare, as would be little for their good, if he should turne upon them, he hastened his march, even to such a pace, as made a shew little diffeing from plaine flight. The Mercenaries presently fell upon his skirts; believing, that for feare of them he was ready to run away. But whileft they confusedly, as in sudden opinion of victory, were driven at the heeles of those that had the Reare; Amilear wheeskdabout, and met them in the face, charging them hotly, but in very good order, fo that, amazed with the apprehension of unexpected danger, they fled without making any relistance. In this overthrow there were fixe thousand of the Mercenaries slaine, and about two thousand taken, the rest sled, some to the Campe at utica, others to the town at the Bridge; whither Amilear followed them so fast, that he wan the place easily; the enemies being thence also fled unto Tunes, as not having recollected their spirits to make

The fame of this victory, together with the diligence of Amilear in pursuing it, caused many Towns revolted, partly by feare, partly by force, to return to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himselfe in this dangerous time. He sent about Numidia and Africk, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or never, to doe their best for the recovery of their freedome; he perswaded Spendim, and Autaritm, that was a Captaine of the Gaules, to wait upon Amilear, and alwayes to keepe the higher grounds, or at least, the foot of some hill, where they might be safe from the Elephants; and he himselfe continued to presse the Town of Hippagreta with an hard siege. It was lecessary for Amilear, in passing from place to place, as his businesse required, to take fich wayes as there were: for all the Country lay not levell. Therefore Spendius, who fill coasted him, had once gotten a notable advantage of ground; the Carthaginians lyng in a plaine, surrounded with hills, that were occupied by the Mercenaries, with their

Numidian and African succours. In this difficultie, the fame of Amilear his personall worth did greatly benefit his Countrie. For Naravafus, a young gentleman commanding over the Numidians, was glad of this occasion, serving to get the acquaintance and love of so brave a man, which he much defired and therefore came unto Amilear, fignifying his good aff. ction to him, with offer to doe him all fervice. Amilear joy fully entertained this friend, promised unto him his own daughter in marriage; and so wan from the enemies two thousand horse, that following Naravasus turned unto the Carthag inians side. With this helpe he gave battell unto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approve his own valour to his new friend. So the victory was great: for there were flaine ten thousand of Spendius his fellowes, and foure thousand taken prisoners; but Spendius to himselfe, with Autarius the Gaule, escaped to doe more mischiese. Amilear dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many as were unwilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they should never more beare armesagainst the Carthaginians; threatning to take sharpe revengeupon all that should

This humanitie was vehemently suspected by Matho, Spendin, and Autarim, astending to win from them the hearts of their Souldiers. Wherefore they resolved to take fuch order, that not a man among them should dare to trust in the good nature of Amilcar, norto hope for any fafety whilest Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of advertisement, wherein was contained, that some of their company, 20 respective only of their private benefit, and carelesse of the generall good, had a purpose tobetray them all unto the Carthag mans, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needfull to look well unto Gefco, and his companions, whom these traitors had a purpose to inlarge. Upon this Theme Spendius makes an oration to the Souldiers, exhorting them to fidelity; and the wing with many words, that the feeming humanity of A milcar, toward some, was none other than a baite, wherewith to intrap them all at once together; as also telling them what a dangerous enemy Gesco would prove, if he might escapetheir hands. While he is yet in the midst of his tale, were letters come to the fame purpose. Then steps forth Autarius, and speakes his minde plainly : saying, that it were the best, yea, the onely way, for the common safetie, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were devising to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with those that had a care of the warsthat it were better to make an end of Gefto his life, than to trouble themselves with looking to his custody; that by such acourse every one should be ingaged in the present Action, as having none other hope left, than in victory alone; finally, that fuch as would speak here-against, were worthy to be reputed Traitors. This Autarius was in great credit with the Souldiers, and could speak fundry languages, in such fort, that he was understood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Gefce, and all the other prisoners, should forthwith by put to horrible death, by torments. Nevertheleffe there were fome, that for love of Gefco fought to alter his intended cruelty; but they were forthwith stoned to death, as a Document unto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they therewithall contented, but further ordined, that all Carthaginian prisoners which they tooke, should be served in like fort: and that the subjects or friends of Carthage, should lose their hands, and so be sent home: which rule they observed ever afterwards.

Of this cruelty I need fay no more, than that it was most execrable feritie. As for the counsell of using it, it was like unto the counsell of Achitophel; All Israel ball beare, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then Shall the hands of all that are with thee be strong. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne fellowes, if they be more innocent; and to avoid the punishment of lesse of fences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the revengefull spirits of those that have been wronged, are breeders of this desperation: to which may be added fome deficiencie of Lawes, in diftinguishing the punishments of malefactors, acded fome deficiencie of Lawes, in change the parameter of their feverall crimes. A coward thinkes all provision too lightly for the decree of their feverall crimes. A coward thinkes all provision too lightly for the decree of their feverall crimes. This notwithstanding, they have many times, by ortain of honour things a reverse is thought a point of honour things. tle for his owne iecuritie. If route ve under times, by orbe murderout. wife would have repented, and fought to make amends, for the wrong done in paffion. This was it which wrought fo much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho, and his Africans, to suspect eventheir gentlenesse, as the introduction to extreme rigour. Like unto the errors of Princes and Governors, are the errors of Lawes. Where one and the same punishment is awarded unto the lesse offence, and unto the greater, he that hath adventured to rob a man, is eafily tempted to kill him, for his own fecu-

Against these inconveniences, Mercie and severitie, used with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilear failed. For as long as these his own souldiers were any way likely to be reclaimed by gentle courses, his humanity was ready to invite them. But when they were transported with beastly outrage, beyond all regard of honesty and hane, he rewarded their villanie with an swerable vengeance, casting them unto wild heafts to be devoured.

Untill this time Hanno, with the Armie under his command, had kept himselse apart from Amilear, and done little as may feem, for that nothing is remembred of him fince his late losses. Neither was Amilear forry to want his help; as being able to doe better without him. But when the war grew to fuch extremity, as threatned utter ruine to the one or the other fide: then was Hanno fent for, and came to Amilear, with whom he joynedhis forces. By this accesse of strength Amilear was not enabled to doe more than in former times; rather he could now perform nothing: fuch was the harred between him and his unworthie Colleague. The Towns of utica and Hippagreta, that had stood alwaves firm on the Carthaginians partie, did now revolt unto the enemie, murdering all the Souldiers that they had in Garrison, and casting their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The provisions brought by sea, for maintenance of the Armie, were lost in foule weather; and Carthage it selfe stood in danger of being besieged, about which Matho and Spendius consulted, whilst one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) bind the others hands.

It hath in all Ages been used as the fafest course, to send forth, in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armie. This was the common practice of those two mighty Cipites Athens and Rome, which other States and Princes have often imitated; perfwading memselves, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excell each other, will use the greater diligence. They have also joyned two diefe Commanders in equal commission, upon this further consideration; the better to refraine the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength. For been fall Common-weals have been jealous, having been taught by their examples that have made themselves Tyrants over those Cities and States that have imployed them. In this point the Venetians have bin so circumspect, as they have, for the most part, tuffed strangers, and not their own, in all the wars which they have made. It is true, that the equall authority of two commanding in chiefes serveth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning upon the Prince or State that hath given them trust: but in managing the war it felfe, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In wars made Mar unto Romeit selse, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two at least, as concurred in one defire of Triumph, which honour (the greatest of any that Rome could gwe) was to be obtained by that one years fervice; it is no marvell, though each of the Consuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts unto none other end than victory. fermall dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise than was defired, one Dictator was appointed, whose power was neither hindred by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeed the manner, to fend forth both the Confuls to mewar; but each went whither his lot called him, to his owne Province; unleffe one businesse seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be joyned in the administration. Now although it was so, that the Romans did many times prevaile with heir joynt Generals: yet was this never or feldom, without as much concord, as any ohervertue of the Commanders. For their modesty hath often been such, that the lesse browes; whereof in the fecond Funick warre we shall finde examples. On the contray fide, in their warres most remote, that were alwayes managed by one, they seldome failed to win exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appeare. Now of those ten Generals, which ferved the Athenians at the Battell of Marathon, it may truely be faid, that had not their temper beene better, than the judgement of the people that fent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Militades; their affaires had found the fame successe which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicil: the one being so over-warie, and the other so hastie, as all came to nought that they undertook: whereas Camon alone, as also Aristides, and others, having fole charge of all, did their Countrie and Common-weale most remarkable service. For it is hard to finde two great Captaines of equall discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of fury than of judgement, and fo the contrary, by which the best to occasions are as often over-slipt, as at other times many actions are unseasonably undertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Conde was flain after the Battell of Jarnac, which Prince, together with the Admiral Chastillan, had the conduct of the Protestant Armie) the Protestants did greatly bewaile the losse of the said Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth; yet comforting themselves, they thought it rather an advancement, than an hinderance to their affaires. For fo much did the valour of the one out-reach the advisednesse of the other, as whatsoever the Admiral lintended to win by attending the advantage, the Prince adventured to lose, by being over-confident inhis own courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present businesse: 20 who, though they were still ficke of their ill grounded love to Hanno, and were unwilling to difgrace him; yet feeing that all ran towards ruine, through the difcord of the Generals, committed the decision of their controversies, unto the Armie that served under them. The judgement of the Armie was, that Hanno should depart the Camp: which he did, and Hannibal was fent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar, and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to prosper somwhat better. Matho and Spendies had brought their Armieneere unto the Citie; and lay before it, as in a fiege. They might well be bold to hope and adventure much; having in their Campe above fifty thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Neverthelesse, the Citie wastoo ftrong for them to win by affault: and the entrance of victuals they could not hinder, if any should be fent in by friends from abroad.

Hieron, King of Syracuse, though during the warres in Sicil he affilted the Romans, and still continued in their alliance, yet now sent succours to the Carthaginians: searing their fall, and consequently his owne; because if no other State gave the Romans fomewhat to trouble their difgestion, the Principalitie of Syracuse would soon be deyoured by them. The Romans also gave them some slender assistance, and, for the prefent, refused good offers made unto them by the Mercenaries. This they did, to shew a kind of noble disposition; which was indeed but counterfeit, as the sequell manifelty

Whilest Matho and his followers were bufily preffing the Citie, Amilear was as dilgent in waiting at their backes, and cutting off all that came to their supply: so that finding themselves more streightly befieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desist from their vaine attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issue into the field: when Spendius, and one Zarcas an African Captaine affifting the rebellion, take upon them to finde Amilear worke; leaving Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a generall care of the businesse. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Naravasus, made Spendius fearefull to descend into the Plaines. Wherefore he betooke himselfe to his former method of warre, keeping the mountaines and rough grounds, or occupying the streightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might shew it self, with little disadvantage. But Amilear had more skill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. He drew the enemy to ma ny skirmishes; in all which the successe was such, as added courage to his owne men and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, provoking then night and day: Itill intrapping some of them, and sometimes giving them the over throw in plaine battell: untill at length he got them into a ftreight, whence ere they should get out he meant to take of them a good account. Their judgement was enough to perceive their owne disadvantage; and therefore they had the lesse stomackets fight; but a waiting for helpe from Tunis. Amilear prudently foreleeing, that necessity might teach them to dare impossibilities, used the benefit of their present searc, & shut themclose up with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miserably for succour, that came not: and having spent all their victualls, were so pinched with hunger, that they fed upon the bodies of their prisoners. This they suffred patiently, as knowing that they had not deserved any favour from Carthage; and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not be unmindfull of them. But when they were driven to fuch extremity, that they were faine to devoure their own companions, and yet faw none appearance or likelihood of reliefe: their obstinacie was broken, and they threatned their Captains with what they deferved, unlesse they would goe forth to Amilear, and seeke such peace as might be gotten, So Spendins, Zarxas, and Autaritus, fell to confulration, wherein it was resolved to obey the multitude, and yeeld themselves, if it were so required, unto the death, rather than perish by the hands of their owne Companions. Hereupon they lend to crave parlie, which is granted; and these three come forth to talke with Amilear inperson. What they could say unto him, it is hard to conjecture: yet by the conditions which Amilear granted, it seemes that they tooke the blame upon themselves, and craved pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should choose, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remaine at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one fingle coate. When the peace was thus concluded; Amilear told these Ringleaders, that he chose them presently, as part of the ten, & so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest he forthwith went to setch with his whole Army in order. The Rebells, who knew nor that peace was concluded upon so gentle articles, thought themselves betrayd and therefore amazedly ran to armes. But they wanted Captaines to order them; and the same astonishment, that made them breake the Covenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gave unto Amilear both colour of justice, in accomplishing revenge, andease in doing the execution. They were all slaine: being forty thousand, or more, in

This was a famous exploit : and the newes thereof exceeding welcome to Carthage; pand terrible to the revolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward Amilear, with his Narava-[m,and Hannibal, carried the warre from Towne to Towne, and found all places ready to yeeld: Mtiea and Hippagreta onely standing out, upon feare of deserved vengeance; & Tunis, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Army. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chiefe strength of the enemie. Comming before this Towne, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellowes, in view of the defendants, and encified them under the walls; to terrefie those of his old companions, that were ftill in ames. With this rigour the siege began; as if speedy victory had been assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay towards Carthage; Amilear on the opposite lide: too far afunder to helpe one another in fixiden accidents; and therefore it behooved

Matho from the wals beheld his owne destiny, in the misery of his companion, and hew not how to avoide it otherwise than by a cast at dice with fortune. So hee brake outupon that part of the Carthaginian Army, that lay fecure, as if all danger were past, under the command of Hannibal: and with fogreat and unexpected fury he fallied, that ter an exceeding flaughter, he tooke Hannibal prisoner; on whom, and thirty the most oble of the Carthaginian prisoners, he presently revenged the death of Spending by the me torture. Of this Amilear knew nothing, till it was too late; neither had he ftrength mough remaining, after this great loffe, to continue the fiege; but was faine to breake it and remove unto the mouth of the River Bagradas, where he incamped.

The terrous was no leffe within Carthage, upon the fame of this loffe, than had beene e joy of the late great victory. All that could beare armes, were fent into the field, undr Hanno; whom, it feemes, they thought the most able of their Captaines surviving the late accidents of Warre. If there were any Law among them forbidding the im-Poyment of one fole Generall neere unto their Citie (for they are knowne to have trufedone man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hafty exigent, to devife about realing it. But thirty principal men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hannoto Amilears anpand by all good perswasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one W. It neerly touched Amilear in his honour, that the carelefnesse of Hannibal seemed to be imputed unto him, by fending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Neverthelesse after many conferences, the authority of the Senators prevailed; Amilear & Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilest this warre lasted, Hanno tooke warning by Hannibals calamiries, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the meane feafon Mathe was come abroad, as meaning to use the reputation of his lare successe, whilest it gave some life unto his businesse. He had reason to doe as he did. but he wanted skill to deale with Amilear. The skirmishes, and light exercises of warre. wherein Amilear trained his Carthaginians, did fo farre abate the strength, and withall diminish the credit of Matho; that he resolved to try the fortune of one battaile:wherein to either his owne desire should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no leffe prone, than Matho: as being weary of these long troubles. and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their owne men, which had anproved it selfe in many trials; and well affured of Amilear his great worth, whereunto the enemie hath not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making provision: inviting their friends to helpe; and drawing forth into the field, all that lay in Garrison. The issue of this battaile might have beene foretold, without helpe of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereon to presume, fave their daring spirits, which had bin well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how 20 to runaway. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as having been often victorious: and in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not easily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely that the defire of liberty should worke so much, in men accustomed to servitudesas the honour of their State would, in citizens, whose future & present good lay all at once ingaged in that adventure. So the Carthaginians wan a great victory, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were flain; the rest sled into a Town, which was not to be defended, & therefore they all yeelded; and Matho himselfe was taken alive. Immediatly upon this victory, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old masters: Utica onely, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they deferved of favour. But they were soone forced, to take what conditions best pleased the victours. Matho and his fellowes were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all tormens that could be devised, in recompence of the mischieses which they had wrought in this war. The warre had lasted three yeares, and about foure moneths, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whose subjects did not love them, should with lesse expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, have prevented in the beginning.

6. IIII.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driven out by the Ilanders. The faithlesse dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the peace.

Hilest Matho and Spendius were making terrible combustion in Africke; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Bostar the Governour, & other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, & hold that Iland to their own use. Against these, one Hanno was fent with a small Army (such as could bee spared in that busie time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, levied on the fudden. But these companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safety, & present profit, to joyne themselves with those that were alread revolted, than to indanger themselves by battaile, for the good of that common-wealth of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebells; of fering to runne one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offerwas kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore, to take away all jealousie and distrust, they resolved to hang up their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A com mon practice it hath beene in all Ages, with those that have undertaken the quarte of an unjust warre, to enjoyne the performance of some notorious aud villainous a

By such a kinde of cruelty did the ungratefull Mantineans murder a Garrison of Achaians, sent unto them for their defence against the Lacedamonians, by Aratus; who, when he had formerly possest himselfe of their Citie, by right of warre, did not onely spare the sacke and spoile thereof, but gave them equall freedome, with the rest of the Cities united. These Revolts are also common in our Court wars; where, in the 10 conquests of new fortunes, and making of new parties, and factions, without the depression or destruction of old friends, we cannot be received and trusted by old enemies, Ce sont les coups de vieille escrime. These, (say the French) be the blowes of the old

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit lesse violent in their purpose, than were spendaus, and his affociates: only they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Province. The Ilanders were no leffe glad, than the fouldiers, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrie: but they could not agree about the profirof the victory. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the foldiers for their paines taken. Contrariwife, the fouldiers were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was devolved unto themselves, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) have risen, between Spendius with this Mercenaries, & their African friends; if the common defire of both had once taken effect: unless the riches of Carthage had served to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Countrie; the matter was not eafily taken up. So they fell to blowes; which how they were delt, I know not; but finally, the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to fave themselves in Italy. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had invited the Romans into it; with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicil. Yet this offer was refused, upon

Some Italian Merchants had relieved Matho and Spendius with corne: of whom the Carthaginians tooke almost five hundred, and held them in prison. Hereof was made a great complaint: fo that the Romans sent Embassadours to Carthage, requiring satisfaction It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yeelded to release them all. This was so kindely taken, that they forbad all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all provisions to Carthage. And upon the same reason, did they for beare to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Mica, offering it selfe unto their subjection. This might have served, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posterity: had not the issue proved, that it was meere regard of greater profit, which kept them so temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thriving better thereby, than they should have done by open breach of faith. The whole effate of Carthage depended at that time, upon the vertue of Amilear: who, had hee bin overthrowne by Spendim or Matho, in one maine battaile, that mighty City must either have fallen into the barbarous hands of mercileste villaines, or have humbledher selfe under protection of the Romans, with whom she had lately striven for superiority. That extreme necessity, whereinto Matho reduced the City, by the fortune of one fallie made out of Tunis, is enough to prove, that Carthage was not farre from such a miserable choice. Wherefore it was not unwisely done of the Romans, to make fuch demonstration of kindnesse, and honourable dealing, as might invite a rich, but finking ship, to runne her selse aground upon their shore. But when all was well onded in Africke, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia: then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her feet againe; began to strike at her head. They Intertained the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced warre against this enseebled and impoverished City, under a shamelesse pretence; that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeede against Rome it ffe.The Carthaginians knew them felves unable to refige; and therefore yeelded to the Romans demand; renouncing unto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not mough. They would have twelve hundred talents, in recompence belike (for Ifee not what reason they could alledge) of the great feare which they had endured, of an invasion from Carthage. It is indeede plaine, that they impudently sought occasion of warre. But necessity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the mony was payed, how hardly soever it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complain of the Punick faith, in breach of Covenants: she her selfe hath broken the peace already, which Amilear puposeth tomake her dearly repent; but what Amilear lives not to performe, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renowned sonne.

How the affaires of Carthage went betweene the African Rebellion, and the Second Punicke Warre.

He injurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to picke a quarrell; ferved to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessarie lesson; That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolve to be obedient unto those that were more mighty, In a City long accustomed to rule, the braver determination easily tooke place: and the best meanes were thought upon, for the increase of puissance and Empire. The strength, and the jealousie of the Romans, forbad all attempts upon the Mediterran Seas; but the riches of Spaine, that lay upon the Ocean, were unknown to Rome: wherefore that Province might serve, both to exercise the Carthaginians in war, and to repaire 20 their decayed forces, with all needfull supplies. Of the Spanish Expedition, the charge and soveraigne trust was committed unto Amilear: upon whom his Countrey did wholly repose it selfe; in hope to recover strength by his means, that had saved it from

Hanno, with some other envious men that were of his faction, tooke little pleasure in the generall love and honour, which daily increased towards. Amilear and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to be the most worthy of command in all the City : onely they commended peace and quietnesse; advising men to beware of provoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such difcourses, harsh to the eares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their 3 Common-weale; they got none other reputation, than of fingularity: which the ignorant fort suspected to be wisedome. But the glory of Amilear was continually upheld & enlarged, by many notable fervices that he did, to the fingular benefit of his Country. He passed the streights of Hercules, (now called the fireights of Gibraltar) and landed on the western coasts of Spaine; in which Country, during nine yeeres that he lived there, he subjected unto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Provinces. But finally, in a battaile that he fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vettones, (defending himselfe a long time with an admirable resolution) he was invironed and slaine: carrying with him to the grave the fame great honour and fame, by which in many fignall victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilear, Afdrubal his fon in law was made Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. This was a good man of warre; but farre better in practice and cunning than in deeds of armes. By his notable dexteritie in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding so many subjects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow jealous againe of this hastie increase. He built a goodly Citie, upon a commodious Haven, in the Kingdome of Granado, opposite to that of Oranin Africa, & gave it the name of New Carthage, which to this day The Spaniards it neerely retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this successe of the Carthagibuilt a Citie of nians in Spaine, the Romans were not a little troubled; but began to accuse their own nethe same gligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much paines to beate them out of the in the West Ha of sind on Sufan Asian painth and the west Ha of s In the West Ile of Sicil, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbring thembeing peopled selves in a warre of farre lesse importance, (whereof I shall speake anon) given them bythem in the leifure, without interruption, to recover upon their owne Continent, a Dominion by far yeere 132-was fack by the exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in revenue, that which the Romans had taken English in the from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily expected years 1880. to be invaded by the Gaules, their ancient enemies, and neerest neighbours to the West. But he needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to be feared: it is enough if he

Yet were the Romans utterly destitute of all good colour, that might helpe them to inremieddle in Spaine. The Spaniards were then unacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the name: so that there were no Mamertines, nor other fuch Rebells, to call in Roman succours. But in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serve their turne in Spaine. Forthough iwere apparent, that the Spanish affaires had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Afdrubal had any purpose, to extend his victories unto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: vet (as if fome such matter had bin suspected) they fent unto him, requiring that he should forbeare to proceede any further, than to the River of Iberus. In addressing their messengers. rather to Afdrubal, than to the City of Carthage; they feeme to have hoped, that howsoever the generalitie of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pilles, to avoide all occasion of warre with Rome, yet the bravery of one man might prove more faltidious, and presenting the injurie, returne such answer, as would intangle his whole once they had found apparent cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of diflike at all : and whereas they would have this infolent covemin inserted into the Articles of peace; he tooke upon him to doe it, of his own power, with fuch appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their wayes contented, Countrie in the quarrell, that they fo much defired; and might embrace at leifure, when and fought no further.

CHAP. 2. 4.5.

If it had been fo, that the State of Carthage, there unto preffed by the Romans, for feare of present warre, had ratified this new composition made by Asdrubal; yet should it not have flood bound in honour, to observe the same carefully, unlesse an oath had also bin extorted, to make all fure. But fince all passed quietly, under the bare authority of Asdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect than a fecond breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more justly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians ofperjurie, (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treaty with Afdrubal, the Romans wan some reputation in Spaine. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would needes be mistreffe over them, stood in feare her selfe, of receiving blowes from a stouter Dame; there were some found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-fervants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another leffon. The Saguntines, a people on the South-fide of Iberus, entred into confederacie with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull unto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither fubject, nor open enemy inwar to the Carthaginians) into their fociety: & unlawfull it was unto the Carthaginians, to use violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Nevertheleffe, if we confider the late agreement made with Afdrubal, we shall finde that the Romans could have none other honest color of requiring it, than an implicit covenant ofmaking the River Iberus a bound, over which they themselves would not passe, in any Discovery or Conquest by them intended to be made upon Spain: in which regard, they might have some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foot, on the one fide of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other fide of that River, held almost all the Countrie. Howsoever it were, this indignity was not so easily digested, as former injuries had beene. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, upon considence of help from a more mighty Cithe. Wherefore either in this respect, or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest inh Juries, or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to doe themselves right: war against Saguntum was generally thought upon, let the Romans take it how they list. Inflichtermes were the Carthaginians, when Aldrubal died, after he had commanded in Spaine eight yeares: (being flaine by a flave, whose master he had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, sonne of the Great Amilear, was chosen Generall in his stead.

The estate of Greece from the death of Pyrrhus, to the reigne of Philip the fonne of Demetrius in Macedon.

N the long terme of the first Funick war; and the vacation following, betweeneit & the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was grown somewhat Like unto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though farre weaker, as in anafter-spring. The whole Country had recovered by degrees, a forme of liberty: the 10 perty tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Captaines, which in the times of generall combustion, had seised each upon such townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, & reformed; and some States were risento such greatnesse, as not only served to defend themselves, but to give protection to others. This conversion to the better, proceeded from the like diffentions and tumults in Macedon, as had bin in Greece, when Philip first began to encroach upon it. For after many quarrels & great wars, about the Kingdome of Macedon, between Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachu, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, & the Gaules : Antigonus, the fonne of Demetrius , finally got and held it, reigning fixe and thirty yeares; yet fo, that he was divers times thence expelled, not only by the Gaules, & by Pyrrhus, as hath bin already shewed, but by Alexander the 10 fon of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose father he had hardly wonit. This happened unto him, by the revolt of his fouldiers, even at fuch time, as having overthrowne with great flaughter an Army of the Gaules, hee was converting his forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to receive his Garrisons. But his young sonne Demetrus raised an Army, wherewith he chased Alexander, not only out of Macedon, but out of his own Egirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the help of this young Prince Demetrius (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corenth; which was justly termed the fetter of Greece. The Citadell called Acrocorinthus, flood upon a fleepe rockie hill on the North fide of the towne, and was by nature and art fo ftrong, that it feemed impregnable. It 30 commanded the townswhich was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus , that running between the Egean and Ionique Seas , joy neth Peloponnefus to the maine of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle, was able to cut off all pussage by land, from one halfe of Greece unto the other; besides the commodity of the two Seas, upon both of which, this rich and goodly City had commodious havens. Alexander, the fon of Polysperchon; and after his death, Cratesipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Provinces and Townes, that was made between Alexanders Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, untill it came, I knownot how, to one Alexander; of whom I finde nothing eife, than that he was thought to be poisoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his wife Nicea thereof, and got it from her by atricke. The device was this. Antigonus fent his yong Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicea, and feeke her marriage. The foolishold widow perceived not how unfit a match she was for the yong Prince, but entertained the fancie of mairiage; wherto the old King was even as ready, to confent as was his sonne to defire, and came this and got into the Castle beguiling the poore Lady, whose jealousse had bin exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not containe himfelfe within the gravity befeeming his old age. But as he had stollen it; so was it againe stollen from him: neither lived he to revenge the losse of it, being already spent Demetrius, the son of this Antigonus, succeeding unto his father, reigned tenyeeres. with age.

ther in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all forts of games: in the middest of which, Antigonus watched his time,

He made greater proofe of his vertue before he was King, than after. The Dardanians, Ætolians, and Achaans, held him continually busied in war; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About the fe times the power of the Macedonians be gan to decay : and the Gracians to cast off their yoke. Philip, the only fon of Demetrius, was a young child when his father died; and there fore Antigonus, his uncle, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minority of the Prince; but he affumed the name and power of a King, though he respected Philip as his own sonne, to whom hee left the Crowne at his death; This Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his protectorship; and was also called Doson, that is a much as; willoire, because he was slow in his liberality. Hee repressed the Dardanians & The Salians, which molested his Kingdome, in the beginning of his reigne. Upon confidence of this good service, he took state upon him, as one that rather were King in his own right, than onely a Protector. Hereupon the people fell to mutinie; but were soone appealed by faire words, and a feeming unwillingnesse of his to meddle any more with the Government. The Achaians tooke from him the city of Athens, soon after Demetrius his death; in and likely they were to have wrought him out of all, or most that he held in Greece if their own estate had not bin endangered by a neerer enemy. But civill diffention, which had overthrown the power of Greece, when it flourished most soverthrew it easily now againe, when it had scarcely recovered strength after a long sicknesse; and gave to this Antigenus no leffe authority therein, than Philip the father of Alexander, got by the like advantage.

These Achaians from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: fo that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equality of their Lawes, and by their elemencie (notwithstanding that they were a long time held under by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not only draw all others by their love and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Pelovonnesw, to be governed by one Law, and to use one and the same fort of weights, meafure, and mony.

Aratus, the Sicyonian , was the first that united them againe; and gave them courage, after that they had bin by the Macedonian Captains divided into many Principalities. In elder times they were governed by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kinde of rule they first subjected themselves, after the descent of the Heraclidas when Tilamenus the son of Orestes possest the Territory of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gyees; after whom, when his fons fought to change the Legall government of their Predecessors into Tyrannie, they expelled them, and made their p State popular; as feeming most equall. This forme of Common-weale, had continuance, with some small changes according to the diversity of times, till the reigne of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like overturned all things in that part of the world. For those twelve Cities, called the Cities of Alliance, whereof Helice, and Bura or Olenin; the Sea had eaten up a little before the Battaile of Leudres; were, by difurbance of the Macedonians, divided from each other, and trained into a war, no leffe foolish than cruell, among themselves. But in the one hundred and foure and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or neere it, Ptolomy the fon of Lagus, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolong Ceraunus, left the world; two of ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patrenses and the Dimei, united themselves, and laid the foundation of that generall acord, and re-union, which after followed. For having been, some of them Partisans with fundrie Macedonian Captaines, and others having bin governed by petry Kings; they began to fasten themselves in a strong league of amitie, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of and partly at such time as Pyrrhus made his first voyage into Italy. Now after the uniting of the Patrenses and Dimei, to whom also the Cities of Titrea, and Phara, joyned themselves; Agira chased out her Garrisons: and the Burians, lilling their Kings, entred with the Ceraumans into the same Confederacie. These Cities, for twenty and five yeares, used the same forme of Government with the Achaians, who by a Senatory and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Common-weale; and soone atter, by one Prætor, or Commander : of which, Marcus Carynenfis was the first, and Aratusthe fecond.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who living at Argos in exile, whileft his Countrie was oppreffed by Tyrants, found meanes, through the helpe of other banished men, to enter their own Citie by night, with ladders; whence they chaled the Tyrant, and restored the people to liberty. This was in the time of Antigonus Gonatas King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get among the Greeks, than wise in looking to his owne. For feare of Antigonus, the Sicyonians enter into the Achaian league: which though at that time it received more increase by their accession than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction served well enough against Antigonm, whose subtilty was somewhat greater than his valour. As the industry and counfaile of Aratus delivered his Country from bondage, and fortified it by the Acharan league; fo further, by his great liberality, with the exceeding great cost of 150. talents, he pacified the inexplicable controversies, between the banished Sicyonians, which returned with him, & the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands; as also with the same money he drew many others to affift him in those enterprises following, that redounded to the fingular good of all Achain. The mony he obtained of Ptolomy Energetes King of Egypt; who partly had a desire to hold some strong & sure friendship in Greece's partly was delighted with the conversation of Aratus himselfe, that made a dangerous voyage to him into Egypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly pictures, with the to gift of many curious peeces, wherein the workemen of sign excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadell of Corinth; which he wanne by night, being thereinto guided by fome theeves that he had hired for the purpose, who living in the place, had practised to rob Antigonus his treasurie, passing in and out by a secret path among the rockes. Yet was he faine to fight for it, ere he could get it : though indeed Antigonus his fouldiers were rather overcome by their owne feare, than by any force of the affailants; as mistrusting lest the Athai ans were more in number, than in truth they were, and having loft the advantages of the place already, upon which they had prefumed, before they were aware of any

In these kinde of night-services, ambushments, surprises, & practices, Aratus was verie cunning, adventurous, and valiant: in open field, and plaine battaile, he was as timorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he ministred argument of disputation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approved) might looke pale and tremble, when he began battaile; and when ther the vertue of Fortitude were diversified, by the fundry natures of men, & in a manner confined unto severall forts of action. In resolving which doubts it may be said; that all vertue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a naturall inclination standeth in need of little practice; whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, use, good successe, and other helpe, yet hardly shall grow absolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In sincere affectionto his Countrie he was unreproveable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will truely testifie.

When Acrocoringhus was taken, and joyned unto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians revolted soone after from Antigonus, and entred into the same Corporation. So did the Trazenians, and the Epideurians: whereby this new erected State grew fo powerfull, that it adventured to take Athens, from the Macedonians, & Argos & Megalopolis, from tyrants that held them. The enterprise upon the Athemans was of none effect. For though Aratus wasted the He of Salamis, to shew his strength, and sent home the Athenian prisoners, without ransome, to allure the City by shew of love ; yet the Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now growne honest slaves to the Macedonians. Upon Argos the adventure was carried more strongly. The Achaians came sometimes to the gates of the Citie, but the people stirred not: once they entred it, and might have wonne it, if the Citizens would have lent any helpe to the recoverie of their owne freedome; fundry times, and with divers events, they fought with the Tyrants, (who rose up one after another in Argos) in open field, and slue one of them in bartaile ; but all sufficed not : untill at length Arzstomachus the Tyrant was so terrefied, perswaded, and hired, by Aratus, that he consented to resigne his Estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus, that had oppressed the Phliasians.

Whilest this businesse with the Argives was on foot, Lysidias the Tyrant of Mega lopolis, was so well handled by Aratus, that, without compulsion, he gave liberty to his Citie, and annexed it to the Councell of Achaia: whereby he got such credit, that he was chosen Generall of their forces (which was a yearely Office, and might not be held two yeeres together by one man:) every fecond yeare, for a certaine while, he and Ara tus succeeded one another by turnes. But those late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Ly dias and Aristomachus, were carried with private passion from care of the generall good in which courses they opposed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as shall appeared in due time.

The Achaans having obtained fo much puissance & reputation, that Ptolomy King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) Generall of their forces by Sea & Land; made open War upon Demetrius the son of Antigonus Gonatas, for the liberty of Athens. It is strange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrell had loft a battaile, the Athenians wore Garlands, in figne of joy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had won the victory. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the rule was verified, that holds true in generall of the multitude, Aut humiliter fervit, aut superbe domination; It is either base in service, or insolent in command. Nevertheleffe when Demetrius Wasdead, Aratus performed that by money, which he could not by force; and corrupting the Captaine of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased liberty to the Athenians, who thenceforth held good correspondence with the Achaans, loving them, and speaking well of them, which was all that they could doe: but into their Corporation they entred not, scorning it belike, in regard of their owne out-worne glory.

of the Historie of the World.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increased within Peloponnesus, by jufice and honestie; so did the Atolians, in the utter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponnesses it selfe, waxevery powerfull, by sturdinesse of body, and rude courage in fight, without help of any other vertue. They had floutly defended them felves against Antipater and Craterus; partly by daving to do & suffer much, partly by the natural strength joand fastnesse of their Country; but especially by the benefit of the time, which called away these famous Captaines to other businesse, as hath bin related. They had molested Callander, in favour of Antigonus, & were themselves as much plagued by him, & by the Acamanians, a little, but a fout Nation, that tooke his part. Afterwards they had to do with Demetrius, the fon of the first Antigonus, & more or leffe with all the Kings of Maadon succeeding him. They likewise held often War with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Peloponnefus: so that they were hardned with perpemall travaile; seldome putting off their Armour. But their hardinesse ill deserved the name of valour, seeing they had no regard of honesty or friendship, measuring all things by their own insolent wills, and thinking all people base minded, that were not as sierce and outragious as themselves.

These Etolians had lately made great spoiles in Peloponnesus, and occupied a good part of the Countrey. They had invaded the friends of the Acheans; taken and facked Pallene; where although they were foundly beaten by Aratus, yet their defire of gaine made them make a new voyage thither, as to a Country wherein somewhat was to bee gotten. But they were forced to looke another way, by Demetrius the foune of Antigomu Gonatas: who preffed them fo hardly, that they were driven to feeke helpe of the Atheans; which they obtained. The warre which the Acheans made upon Demetrius, without Peloponnessus, in Atrica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly unto the Etolians, at whose instance iwas fet on foot : for therby were the Macedonian forces diverted from them. Neither was this good turne unacknowledged; though very basely the Etolians, giving thanks inwords, devised how to requite the benefit with some great mischiefe. They saw that the Achaens were defirous to bring all Peloponnessus into their Alliance & Corporation: of which intent , the Laced amonians were very jealous. Wherefore these Etolians laboured earnestly, to fet the Lacedemonians and Achaens together by the eares: hoping that if this might come to passe, they themselves should be called in to helpe (it skilled not on what side) & so get no small share, both in bootie & Territory. Neither did they forbeare to communicate this their device unto Antigonia; offering to make him partaker of their gaine, whom they knew to bee offended with the many loffes, that this Kingdom had fustained by the Acheans. Of this plot Aratm was aware: who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to give the Laced amonians cause to take Armes. But this resolution was taken somwhat too late: & not altogether in his own power to hold. He had bin meddling with the Arcadians, that were dependants of Lacedamon: and thereby had provoked the Lacedamonians to looke about them; seeing that all Peloponness, excepting themselves, the Eleans, and a few Artadians their friends (who also were attempted) was already become Achean.

The City of sparta was in ill case about these times; & subject to the injuries of any Itonger neighbour Pyrrhus had greatly weakned it; The Etolians entring Laconia with an Armie, had carried away fifty thousand flaves; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Avarice & Luxury reigned among them, the poore was oppresfedby the rich, and the generofity of spirit, that had sometime bin their generall vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta no more than feven hundred naturall Citizens; of whom not above one hundred had Lands all the rest were needie people, and desirous of innovation. Hereupon followed intestine sedition, which endangered the City most of all. Agis a good King, who fought to reforme the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict observation of Lycurgus his lawes. To which purpose he caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equall division of Lands. All the younger, and poorer fort were glad of this: but the 10 rich men opposed it. These had recourse unto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who tooke their part: being himselfe a dissolute man, as one trained up in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the Citie, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends & Counsailors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their owne private commodity. They were hafty to take away all debts, and cancell all bonds, for they themselves were deeply indebted : but the division of lands they afterwards hindred, because their owneposfessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these men increased by their foule oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leonidas was brought home, and reflored to his Kingdome, and the two adverse Kings driven to take Sanctuarie; out 10 of which , Cleombrorus, the late-made King, was dismissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into prison, and there by his enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grand-mother. The like to this was never known in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this cruelty proceeded from the Ephori, Magifirstes that should have given Patronage to the lawes, using their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the City, as the law required.

The death of Agio was much lamented by all good Citizens; and ferved to establish the imporent rule of a few tyrannicall oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope to adjoine Lacedamon to the Achaans Common-wealth: though it were great injuffice 34 to take such advantages, and attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the generall good of Peloponnesus, and to the benefit of Sparta it selfe, if it could have bin

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and revenged the deathof Ago, did also requite the injust attempts of the Achaans, even in their own kinde: obtruding upon them by force an union of all Peloponnefus, though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedemonians and their King, should have bin the principall; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas having thus caused agis to be flaine, tooke his wife that was very rich and beautifull, and gave her in marriage (perforce) to his owne fon Cleomenes. This young Prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, and fought to win her af- 4 fection, as well as he had her person. Hee discoursed much with her about the purpose of her former husband Agis, and by pittying his misfortune, began to entertaine a defire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So comming himselfe to be King, whilest hee was very young, he gladly embraced all occasions of Warre: for that he hoped by ftrong hand to effect that, which Agis by proceeding formally, in fo corrupt an estate of the City , had attempted to his own ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gave him in charge, to take and fortifie Athenaum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretented title; he readily performed it Hereof Aramade no complaint but fought to take by furprize Tegea & Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Laced emonians: wherin, his intelligence failing, he loft the labor of a painful nights travel, & discovered his enmity to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing forrie. By these degrees the war began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discovered the Livilian practice, and therefore would have staied the quarrell from proceeding too far. But Lyfiadas and Aristomachus would needs fight, and he could doe none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomanes was so urgent. Aristomachus was atthat time Generall of the Achaans, (He and Lyfiadas being of great account, fince they had abandoned their tyrannie) who fent unto Ararus, lying then in Athens, and require his affaitance in a journie to be made into Laconia. No distivations of Aratus would serv

therefore he came in person, and tooke part of abusinesse, little pleasing him in the prefort, and leffe in the future . When he met with Cleomenes, he durft not fight; but oppofed himselfe against Aristomachin, who defired to give battaile. Yet had the Acheans twenty thousand foot, and one thousand horse, in their Army whereas Cleomenes had nomore than five thousand in all. This gave reputation to the Laced amonian, and raised anill report upon Aratus; which Lyfiadas helped to make worfe, by accufing his cowar-Aire. Nevertheleffe the Acheans would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their Generall the yeare following against Lystadas his accuser that fired for the place. Being Generall himselfe, it behooved him to confute, with deeds, the flandes nois words of Lyfiadus. Therefore he purposed to fet upon the Eleans : but was mer withall on the way, neere unto the Mount Lycetti, by Cleomenes; who vanquished him in a great battaile, and drave him to hide himfelfe all night for feare, fo that he was thought to have bin flaine. This misadventure Agatus recompenced by a tricke of his owne more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Army, that which could hardly have bin expected, had he bin victorious. For whilest there was no suspicion of any great matter that he could undertake; he fuddenly wrought with fome of the Mantineans, who did let him into their city. These Mantineans, (whom he had thus brought whis purpose) had once before joyned themselves with the Achaians; but shortly upon feare, or some other passion, they gave themselves to the Atolians; and from the Atol lians, presently after this victory to Cleomenes, from whom immediatly they were thus won For this their levity they were not punished, but freely admitted now again into the Ashean fociety. As this good fuccesse repaired the credit of Aratus; so another battaile almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountred neere unto Megalopolis; where the Achiean had fomewhat the better at the first, but their Generall durst not follow his advanage. Thereupon Lyladas, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; & taking with him all the horse, brake upon the Lacedemonians, whom he routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too far into places of hard passage, he was slaine by them, and his followers driven backe upon their own Companions; in fuch fort, that fimlly all the Army was difordered and put to flight. This was a great loffe, and incenfed the Achains against Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercenaries which hehad waged. This Aratus tooke patiently, & followed the warre neverthelesse; whereinthough Cleomenes wanne fome Townes, and Aratin got the better in one finall fight. yelittle of importance was done; the Acheans being wearie, and the Spartan King intentive to another businesse.

Cleomenes having ledde into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painfull journies, for fooke the Achiean warre on a fudden, and came unexperced home to Sparta, where he flue the Ephori, and reftored by force the ancient discipline of Lycurgus. Then gave he an account of his doings: and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroched upon the power of Kings, & many diforders had grown in the Citie; hee justified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equal division of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. He also supplied the defect of Citizens, by choofing new out of fuch as were friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Country might not altogether stand in need of Mercenarie helpe, as it lately had done, to fave it felfe from the Etolians, Illyrians, and fuch other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spartans well satisfied; and Cleomenes himlefe ready in the field, ere his enemies could take any advantage of these his domestical troubles.

The Acheans hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long ere Cleomenes durst iffue forth of the City, for feare of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had wasted all the Country of Megalopolis; had ranged over all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Mantinea; and ready to take other places, even of Achaia. These newes displeased them not a little: but they must patientyendure to heare worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephoris that curbed his authority, he proceeded more roundly in his worke, being better obeyed and by better men. His Lacedemonians refumed their ancient courage; and he himfelfe had the heart to demand the Principality of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth contend about the possession of a few Townes: but adventured to winne or lose all. The Atoleans, in favour of his accompt declared themselves on his fide : and whereas he had gotten Mantinaa, Tegea, and other places, to which they had fome title, they willingly renounced all their interest unto him.

Aratu did apprehend the danger of his Country, and faw that Antigonus, with the *Etolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleome. nes had thus begunne. Therefore he devised how to provide against the worst, and either to repaire all, or (if it could not be) to fave all from utter rune. The office of Ge. nerall, when it was next put upon him, he refused, fearing to be so far prest, as to hazzard in one battaile all the force of his Country, to which as he had never any affection, nor perchance courage lo was his maner of warfare otherwise. For he commonly attempted in by surprise, & desended upon the advantage of place, after the maner of the Irish, and of all other Nations, over-charged with numbers of men. Yet did hee not forsake the care of the Weale-publique, though in aiming at the generall good, it seemes that private passion drew him into an ill course. He saw, that Megalopolis could not bedefen. ded without making a dangerous hazzard of battaile; that Mantinea had not onely opened her gates unto Cleomenes, but flaine the Achean Garrison that lay therein; that other Townes had veelded unto him, without compulsion; and that Aristomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and fince Generall of the Acheans, was now revolted unto the one. mie, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolomy was too farre off to helpe; and the neernesse of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be usefull, if this King would (as Polybius faith) like others, bee friend or enemie, as should best agree with his owne profit. To make triall hereof, Aratus practifed with some of Megalopolis, whom he found apt unto his purpole; and instructed them how to deale both with Antigonm, and

The City of Megalopolis had beene well affected to the Macedonians, ever fince the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it unto him by some especiall benefits. At this time it lay neerest unto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deserved succour; yet could not well be releeved by the Acheans, with their owne proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadours should be sent unto the generall Councell of Achaia, requesting leave and good allowance, to trie the favour of Antigonus in their necessitie. This was granted, for lacke of what else to answer: and the same Embassadours dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their owne errand briefly; telling him of the good will and respect which their City had of long time borne unto him and his Predecessors; of their present need; and how it would agree with his honour to give them aide. But when they delivered the more generall matter, wherein Aratus had given them instruction; shewing how the ambition of Chomenes, and violence of the Atolians, might redound to his owne great loffe or danger, if the one and the other were not in time prevented; how Aratus himselfe did ftand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achaens under the Patronage of Macedon: then beganne Antigonus to lend a more attentive eare to their discourse. He embraced the motion : and to give it the more life, he wrote unto the Megalopolitans, that his helpe should not be wanting, so farreforth, as it might stand with the Acheans good liking. Particularly he commended himselfe, by these Messengers to Aratus; affuring them, that he thought himselfe highly bound to this honoursble man, whose former actions he now perceived, not to have beene grounded upon any hatred to the Macedonians, but onely upon a just and worthy love to his owne Nation. With this answer they returned to Megalopolu: & are presently sent away to the Councell of Achaia; there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessity of the time required. The Acheans were glad to heare, that Antigonus was fo inclinable to their defire; & therefore were ready to entertaine his favour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gave his consent; and praised the wisedome of his Countrimen, that so well difcerned the best and likeliest meanes of their common safety : adding neverthelesse, that it were not amisse, first of all to try their owne ability; which if it failed, then should they do well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he shewed himselfe moderate, in that which himselfe of all others did most wish: to the end, that he might not afterward fustaine the common reprehension, if any thing onely followed, and that leifurably, the generall consent.

Neverthelesse, in true estimation, this finenesse of Aratus might have bin used, with his greater commendation, in a contrary course. For it had bin more honourable to make an end of the war, by yeelding unto Cleomenes that power which they gave unto Anticonus: fince thereby he should both have freed his country from all further trouble; and withall, should have restored unto the universall state of Greece, that honourable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found, (which is great nittie) that Vertue, having risento honour by degrees, and confirmed it selfe, (as it were) in the feat of Principality, by length of time, and successe of many actions, can ill endure the hastie growth of any others reputation, wherewith it sees it selfe likely to be overtopped. Other cause to despise the Laced amonians there was none, than that they lately had bin in dangerous case:neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should preferre Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had stood in doubt of the one, when he thought himselfe more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was justly plagued, when he saw hisown honours reverfed by the infolent Macedonians; and in stead of living as a comnanion with Cleamenes, that was descended of a long race of Kings, the posterity of Herrules, was faine to doe facrifice unto Antigonus, as unto a god, and was finally poyfoned by Philip, whose Nobilitie was but of five descents, and whom perhaps hee might have feenehis fellowes, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the love of Ptolomie was lost: who forthwith tooke part with Cleomenes, though hedid not supply him with such liberality, as he had used to the Achaans; being warned, as may feeme, by their example, to be more wary both in trusting and disbursing. Chomenes himselfe, whilest this businesse with Antigonus was a-foot, passed through Arcadia with an Armie, and laboured by all meanes to draw the Achaans to battell. At the Citie of Dymes in Achaia were affembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their efate, without feeking helpe of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, & there fought with them; where he had fo great a victory, that the enemy was no longer able to keepe theopen field. The calamity was fuch, that Aratus himselfe durst not take upon him to betheir Generall, when his turne came in the next election. Wherefore the Achaens pwere compelled to fue for peace; which was grunted upon this eafie condition: That they hould not arrogate unto themselves the command of Peloponnesw, but suffer the Laced amomans (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in war. Hereunto if they would condefand, he promised unto them, that he would presently restore all places taken from them, and all his prisoners ransom-free; also that they should enjoy their own Lawes and Liberus without molestation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleasing to the Achiem; who defired him to come to the Citie of Lerna, wherea Parliament should be held, forthe conclusion of the War.

Now feemed the affaires of Greece likely to be fettled inbetter order, than they had ever bin fince the beginning of the Peloponnesian Wars, yea, or fince the Persian invasia on: when God, who had otherwife disposed of these matters, hindred all, with a draught fold water, which Cleomenes dranke in great heat, and thereupon fellextreme ficke, and so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Nevertheleffe he fent home the chiefe of his prisoners, to shew that he meant one other than good faith. By this faire dealing he confirmed the Acheans in their dereofhis friendship: who assembled againe at Argos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it; and sought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Countrimen afraid of refolving. When all would not serve turne, he betooke inselfe to his cunning; and sent word to Cleomenes, that he should doe well to leave his Armie behinde him, and come alone into Argos, receiving hostages for safetie of his Erson. Cleomenes was already far on his way, when he met with this advertisement; and tooke it in ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had bin an easie matter, to have told him so much at the first, and not have made him come so far with an Army, which afterwards he must dismisse. Yet that which chiefly seemes to have troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who fought therby, either to make him wait without the gares, and deale only with themselves and their Messengers, or if he would adventure imfelse into the Citie, then to deprive him of all Royall shew, that might breed refellout amisse; fince it might appeare, that he had not beene Author of this Decree, but the multitude. This was that indeed which Aratsus feared, & for which he hught to hinder his comming thither in person; lest the people, hearing the promises of Cleomenes ratified by his owne mouth, should presently be wonne with his gentle words, and finish the bargaine without more adoe. Therefore Cleomenes wrote unto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining against these juggling tricks : and Aratus was not farre behind with him, in as bitter an Oration. So betweene feare of the one, and reverence of the other, the Affembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake up.leaving all, as it were, to fortune. Cleomenes tooke his advantage of their present weakeneffe, and renewed the Warre. Many Cities yeelded unto him willingly; many he forced; and partly by force, partly by terrour, he wan Argos, which never King of Sparta before him could doe. In this case Araim sent his owne sonne to Anigonus, intreating him to deferre no time, but come presently to relieve the distressed Acheans. Anizonus, gave good words as could be wished: faving that he utterly refused to doe any thing. unlesse he might first have Acrocorinthus put into his hands. This demand was some. what like unto that of the Hunter, who promifed to helpe the Horse against his enemy the Stagge: but with condition, that the horse should suffer himselfe to be saddled and bridled. Arauwwas herewithall contented, but wanted all honest colour to doe it feeing the Corinihians had no way deserved to be thus given away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiving what hee intended, were minded to arrest him. So he withdrew himselfe out of their Citie, and fent word to Antigonus, that their Castle should be ready to let him in- The Corinhians on the other fide ranne to Cleomenes; who lost no time, but made haste with them to a Corinib, where he fought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to save it from Antigones, by furrounding it within Trenches, that none might iffue nor enter without his leave. Whilest this was doing, he tooke speciall order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Towne, should be kept for the Owner; to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians, to Peloponne fus; promiting, that if he would hearken to thele perswasions, then would be give him double the same pension, which he had been wont to receive of King Ptolomie: As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponne fu, and without which none could hold affured foveraigntie of the Countrey; he defired that it might not be committed unto his own disposition, but be joyntly keptby the Lasedamonians and Achaans. All this entreaty served to no purpose. For Araungejecting utterly the motion, fent his owne sonne as an Hostage to Anigonus; and laboured with the Achaans, to put Acrocorinibus into his hands. Which when Cleomenesunderstood, he seised upon the goods of Anatus in Corinth, and wasted all the Countrey of Szcyon, whereof this his Adversary was native.

Antigonus in the meane time drew neere to the Ishmus; having passed with his Amy through Eubæa, because the Erolians held the streights of Thermopyle against him. This they did, either infavour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatnesse, whereunto the Macedonians might attaine by the good successe of this jourmy. At his comming thither he found the Lacademonians ready to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazzard battell, but rather to weary him thence with hunger, against which he came nor well provided. Antigons therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able fo to doe: hee fecretly got into the Corinthian Haven; but was violently driven out againe, withgreat losse of men; finally, he resolved to turne aside, and seeke a passage over the gulfe of Corinth, to Szcyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not eafily made.

In this perplexity, newes from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Anigone and no leffe troubled his enemies. The Achaans were gotten into that Citie; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driven out of the Cittade, yet was hardly diffressed, and stood in need of present helpe. Argos had alwayes been enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes tooking he forbare to chace out those whom he most suspected partly at the entreaty of friends and partly for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperity. They were glading deed of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that would cause all debtors to be discharged from their creditors, as he had lately done fuch as were disappointed of their unjust hopes, began to turne good Common-wealths men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because hee would not doe the like abroad. So they tooke their time, invited the Acheans, affailed his Garrison, cut in peeces the rescue that he sent, and compelled him at length to forsake the desence of Corinth, and looke unto the enemies that were behind his back. For when he understood by continuall messages, that his men which held the Cittadellat Argos were almost lost be began to feare left his labour in guarding the entry should grow frivolous; the Acheans in the meane while spoyling all that lay within. Therefore he for sooke his custody of the 1sthmus, and made all haste rowards Argos: which if he could fave, he meant to trust fortune with the rest. And so farre he prevailed at his comming to Argos, that both Argives and Acheans were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the treets: when the horsemen of Antigonus were discovered afarre off, hasting to relieve the Citizens; and Antigonus himfelfe (to whom Corinth was yeelded, as soone as the Spartan had turned his backe) following apace with the body of his Armie. Cleomenes therefore had no more to doe, than to make a fafe retrait. This hee did, and got him home into Laconia: lofing in short space all, or most of that which he had bin long in Antigonia having shewed himselfe at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where he wan such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored them to theold Possessions. This done, he tooke his way to Egium, where was held a Parliament by the Acheans; to whom he declared the cause of his comming, and spake brave words, that filled them with hope. The Achaans were not behinde with him; but made him Captaine-Generall over them and their Confederates: and further entred into covenant with him, That they would not deale with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embaffadour, without his consent. All this while, and somewhat longer, Aratin was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon his owne Towne, (for Winter was come on) where he not only feafted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane honours, as facrifices and the like, to be done unto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (forfooth) a very wife bargaine, if in stead of Cleamenes, that would have bin a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poore, and wanting wherewith to pay his Masedonians, imposed the burthen upon the Asheans. This was hardly taken; yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Araten himfelfe over-carefully respected; when the statues of those Tyrants, which he had throwne downe in Argos, were againe erected by Antigonius; or when the statues, which he had trefted, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all throwne downe by the fame King, and one onely left unto himselfe at his earnest intreaty. It might therefore appeare, that this God was also spightfull. Nevertheleffe in taking revenge upon thosethat offended him, Aratus did satisfie his own passion by the aide of these Macedoonians. For with extreme torments he did put Aristomachus to death, who had bin once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards Generall of the Acheans, and from them revolting unto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like fort handled he (though not as yet) the Mantineans, for their ingratitude and cruelty shewed to the Acheans. For he slue all the principall Citizens, and fold the rest, men, women, and children, all for bondflives dividing the spoyle; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Atheans. The Towne it felfe was given by Antigonus to the Argives; who peopled it with a Colony of their own; and Aratus having charge of this businesse, caused it to be new-named Antigonia. Surely of this cruelty there can be no better excuse, than even the flattery which Aratus was driven to use to Antigonus: for a finuchas it was a token of servility, whereinto they had urged and brought him; whom he, as in revenge thereof, did thus requite. But leaving to speake of this change, which the comming in of the Macedonian Wrought in the Civill state of the Acheans; let us returne unto his war against the Lace-

The next Summer Antigonus wan Tegea, Mantinaa, Orchomenus, Heraa, & Telphuffa: Mantinea he dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garrison of is Macedonians; the rest he restored to the Achaans, with whom he wintred at Agi-Sparta. But that which Clemenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartaninh my where they held a Parliament. Once only Clemenes had met him this yeare; and that third in other places, where it would have been tyrannicall, he did it not. Thereupon was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his owne Territory. The 348 reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantinea, & to those other Townes that he wan, was this: He had few Souldiers, and had not money enough to wage more. Ptolonie the Egyptian promised much, but would performe nothing, unlesse he might have Cleomenes his own Mother, and his children in pledge. These were fent into Egypt, yet the aide came not. For Ptolomie was flow; as dealing in the bufinesse of Greece, rather for his mindes sake, than upon any apprehension of necessity. Cleomenes therefore provided for himselfe, as well as his own ability would serve. Hemanumifed all the Heilotes, which were the Lacedamonian flaves: taking mony for their liberty, and arming two thousand of them after the Macedonian fashion. Having thus increased his forces, he came on the sudden to Megalopolis; that lay secure, as having defended it felfe in more dangerous times, and having now Antigonia neere at hand in &gium. The towne he wan: but after he was entred, all that were fit to beare Armes role hastily against him; and though they could not drive him out, yet faved the multitude, to whom they gave a Port free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Towne and goods to them againe, if they would be of his party. But they bravely refused his offer: wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Spartaagreat bootie that he found therein. These newes astonished the Achaans at Agrum: who thereupon brake up their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were so long in comming, that Cleomenes was fafely gone home. Therefore he returned them back to their lodgings, and went him- 20 felfe to Argos, there to passe the rest of his unluckie winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the grieved Achaens. When he had laine a while at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates, with no great number of men, yer with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argives perceiving that their Country would be spoyled, if Antigonia did not issue into the field, were very earnest with him to goe forth and fight. But he was wifer than tobe moved with their clamors; and suffered them to see their villages burnt; tobid him religne his Office of Protector unto some that were more valiant; and to satisfie their pathons with foolish words; rather than he would be overcome in fight, and thereby lose more honour than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his defire, inweakning the reputation of his enemie: though he thereby added neither followers, nor other Arength unto Lacedamon.

Afterwards, when the leason was more fit for war, Antigonsus gathered togetherall his troups; meaning to requite these bravadoes of his enemie, with the conquest of sparta. Cleamenes, on the other fide, laboured to keepe the war from his owne gates; and therefore entred upon the Country of Argos, where he made such havock, as drew Antigonus thirher, from his intended invation of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedoman was faine to endure, in coasting of the Spartan King; that ranging over the Country of the Argives, Phliafians, and Orchomenians, drave a Garrison of his out of Oligyrin; and did factifice, as it were, before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Jano, that was thut up; fending unto him in scorne, to borrow the keyes. Thesewere light things; yet ferved to dif-hearten the Achean fide, and to fill the enemie with conrage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore he concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazzard; by fetting up his rest, with our any more delay, upon Sparta it selfe. He had in his Army eight and twenty thoufand foot, and twelve bundred horse, collected out of fundry Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrsans, Guules, Epirots, Boeotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Athans, and their friends of Peloponnesm. Cleomenes had of all forts twenty thousand, with which he lay at Selasia: fortilying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Matedonians were not likely to seeke entrance. Antigonus, comming unto Selafia, found his enemie to ftrongly incamped, upon and between the hils of Eva and Olympsu, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before he could advance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, which he greatly defired, without the hazzard of his whole Armie, in affailing their well-defenced Camp But at length (as it happens, when men are wearie both of their hopes and feares) both Kings being refolved to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with Illyrians to force that part which lay on the hill Eva. But his Illyrians were foill fecon ded by the Achean foor, that the Spartanhorse, and light-armed foor, incampeding Areight valley betweene those hills, iffuing forth, fell upon their skirts, and not only disordered them; but were like to have endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himselfe had food in that part of the battell, hee would have made great use of such a faire beginning. But Euclydas, his brother, a more valiant than skilfull Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this advantage, nor tooke such benefit as the ground affoorded, whereon he lay . Philopæmen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proved a famous Captaine, served then on horse, as a private young man, among the Acheans. Hee feeing that all was like to goe to rout, if their Illyrians were driven to fall backe upon the Annie following them; perswaded the Captaines of the Achean horse, to breake upon the Spartan Mercenaries. But they would not : partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had given order, that they should keepe their places, 10 untill they received a figne from him, which was not as yet. Philopæmen perceiving them to be more orderly than well advised, intreated some of his own Countrimen to follow him, gave a charge on the Spartans, and forced them, not only to leave the Illyreans, but feek how to fave themselves. Being so far advanced, he found the place which the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to be won, through the unskilfulnesse of him that held it. Wherefore he allighted, and perswaded the men at Armes his Companions to doe the like : the folly of Euclydas being manifest, who kept the top of the hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plaine, where they might fight upon even termes. So he recovered the Hill top; where though he was foreiturt, yet he made good the place that he had gotten, untill the whole Armie came up to him; by which the Lacedamonians were beaten from it, with great flaughter of them in their descent. This overthrow, and death of Euclydas, made Cleamenes lose the day: who fighting bravely on the other fide, upon Olympus, against Antigonus himselfe, was like to have beene furrounded and lost, if he had not withdrawne himselfe with an extraordiw speed. In this battell ended the glory of Laced emon, which, as a light ready to goe out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, than in many ages paft;

Cleamenes fled unto Sparta; where he had no defire to flay; finding onely two hundred left, of fixe thousand Spartans that he had led unto this battell, and most of his hipred Souldiers dead; or gone away. So he perswaded his people to yeeld themselves unto Antigonus; and promifing to doe all that should at any time lye in his owne power, for their good, he hafted away to the Sea-fide (where he had shipping long before provided against all that might happen) and imbarqued himselfe for Egypt. He was lovingly emertained by Ptolomie Euergetes; who undertooke to restore him to his Kingdome, and (perhaps) meant no leffe, as being much delighted with his gallant behaviour, and qualities. In the meane feafon, he had a penfion allowed him, of foure and twenty Talents, yearely. But this Ptolomie died; and his son Ptolomie Philopater succeeded him: avicious young Prince, wholly governed by lewd Women; and base Men, unmindefill of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was defirous to returne into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponnesus did feeme to invicehim; Ptolomie and his Minions, would neither give him aide; nor yet dared to difmisse him (as he desired) to trie his own friends in Greece, because he was too well acquainted with the weakenesse of Egypt: nor well knew how to detaine him against his will. At length they devised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him was, that with thirty of his Countrimen, he undertooke a desperate enter-Prize: breaking out of the prifon, and provoking the Alexandrians to rebell and seeke their liberty. In which attempt he flew some enemies of his that he met; and having walked up and down the streets without refishance (no man offering to take his part, or which is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalfe) hee, and his Companions, agreed together to be ministers of their own death. Upon his dead body Prolomie was bold to shew his indignation: and flue his Mother and Children, that had beene fent thither as Hostages, together with the wives of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending upon the old Queene. Such was the end of Cleomenes, a generous Prince, but Son of Leonidus, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to such a bloudy end, as now befell his owne Wife, Son, and Grandchildren.

After the victory at Sellasia, Antigonus without resistance entred Sparta: whereintonever the force of any Enemy, before him, could make way. He kindely intreated Rrrr 3 L 507 3 the Citizens, and left them to their own lawes and Government: tarrying there no longer than two or three dayes; after which he haftened out of Peloponness, and never returned. The cause of his speedy departure was, an advertisement that he received out of Macedon; how the Illyrians over-ran, and destroyed the Countrie. Had these newes come a little fooner, or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few dayes longer, or at least-wise tarried a few dayes after the fight, in Sparta; the Kingdome of Lacedamon would have stood, and perhaps have extended it self over all Greece. But God had otherwise determined.

Antigoniu fought a great battell with the Illyrians, and overcame them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by over-ftraining his voyce; wherewith he to brake a veine that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, who was troubled before with a confumption of the lungs. His Kingdome descended unto Philip, the son of Demetrim, being then a boy as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, surnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolomy Philopater, began to reign in Afia, and Egypt; Boyes all. Of these, Ptolomie, though old enough to love Harlots, when he first was king, yet continued a Boy all the feventeen years of his reign. The unripe age of Philip & Antiochin, bred fuch intestine inconvenience to their Kingdomes, as is usuall in the minority of Princes: but their elder years brought them acquainted with the Romans; upon which occasion, when it comes, we shall more seasonably speak of them, and of their kingdoms, more at large.

How the Illyrians infested the coast of Greece, and how they were subdued by the Romans.

Hilft things thus passed in Greece, and whilst the Carthag mians were busie in their conquest of Spain; the Romans had found themselves work among the Sardinians and Corficans, that were eafily subdued at first, & easily vanquished again, when they rebelled. They made also war with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little pain. With the Gaules they had much adoe, that lasted not long; being rather, as Livie faith, a tumult than a war. So that by all these light exercises their valour was hardly kept from rust. How they got the Ilandsin the Mediterran Sea, it hath bin shewed before: of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gaules, it is not meet to be utterly filent.

The Illyrians inhabited the Country now called Slavonia; a troublesome Nation, inpatient of rest, and continually making war for gaine, without either regard of friendor foe. They were invited by Demetrin, king of Macedon, to help the Mydiomans his friends, that were befieged by the Etolians; for that they refused to be of their society. Before the Illyrians succours came, the Mydionians were so far spent, that the Atolians contended about the booty: the old Prætor, or chiefe Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his office, claiming to have the honour of the victory, and the division of the fpoyle to be referred unto him; for that he had in a manner brought the fiege to an end, and won the towne: others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and defiring that old orders might be kept. It was a prettie strife, and somwhat like to that of the French in later ages, who thought upon dividing the prey, before they had won the victories, which anon they loft, at Poitiers and Agincourt. The Etolians wifely compounded the difference, ordering it thus, That the old, and the new Prætor should be joynthy intitled in the victory, and have equal authority in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arrived, and landed ere any was aware of them; they fell upon the Etolians; and though good refistance was made, yet got the victory, partlyby force of their multitude, partlyby the help of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their own busines, but foutly fallied out of the town. Many of the Etolians were flain, more were taken, their camp and all their baggage was loft: the Illyrians took the spoyle, and went their way; the Mydionians etc. Ated a Trophie, inscribing the names both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chofe new Officers at the same time) as the Atolians had directed them by example. The successe of this voyage highly pleased Agron King of the Illyrians: not only regard of the mony, wherewith Demetrius had hired his affiftance; or of the booty than was gotten; but for that having vanquished the stoutest of the Greeks, he found it not uneasie to inrich himselfe by fetting upon the lesse warlike. For joy of this he feasted, and dranke so immoderately, that he fell into a Pleurise, which in few dayes ended his life. His Kingdome, together with his great hopes, he left unto Teuta his wife.

Teuta gave her people free liberty to roball forts at Sea, making no difference berweenfriend and foe; as if she had beene sole Mistresse of the salt Waters. She armed a fleet, and fent it into Greece; willing her Captaines to make warre where they found advantage, without any further respect. These fell with the western coast of Peloponnessus wherethey invaded the Eleans, and Messenians. Afterwards they returned along by Evirus, and stayed at the Citie of Phanice, to take in victuals and other necessaries. There lav in Phanice eight hundred Gaules, that having bin Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Agrigentum, then Eryx, to the Romans; but failing to doe either they neverthelesse revolted, and were for their misdeeds disarmed and sent to sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lye in Garrison within their Towne. The Gaules were foone growne acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phanice; which deserved none other, intrusting them. All Epirus was presently in armes, and hastned to drive out these unwelcome guests. But whilest the Epirots lay before the Towne, there came newes into their Campe, of another Illyrian Armie, that was marching thitherward by Land, under one Scerdilaidas, whom Queene Testa had fent to help his fellowes. Upon this advertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonia, to make good that Town, and the streights adjoyning by which these new commers must enter into their Countrey; another part of them remaines at Phanice, to continue the fiege. Neither the one nor the other fped well in their business. For Scerdilaidas found meanes to joyne with his fellowes; and they that were befreged within Phanice, fallied out of the town, and gave fuch an overthrow to the Epirots, as made them despaire of saving their Country, without great and speedy help from abroad. Wherefore Embassadors were sent to the Acheans and Atolians: craving their help, with very pitifull terms of intreaty. They obtained their fuit; neither was it long, before an Army, sent by these two Nations, was ready in Epirus, to present battell unto Sterdilaidas. But Scerdilaidas was called home by letters from Tenta the Queene, that fignified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no mind to put his fores to hazzard, but offered composition, which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirors might ranfome their Towne, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart with all their booty and slaves. Having made this profitable and honourable bargain, the Illyrians returned into their own country by lands fending their booty away by Sea.

Attheir comming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, orhad occasioned in this voyage. For, in fulfilling the commandement of their Queene, otheyhad taken many Italian Merchants, whilest they lay at Phænice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made unto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embaffadours were fent to require of Teuta, that she should abstaine from doing such injuries. These Embassadours found her very jolly; both for the riches which her sleet had brought in; and for that she had, in short space, tamed her Rebels, and brought all to good order, save only the Town Issa, which her forces held streightly besieged. Swelling with this prosperity, she could hardly afford a good look to the Romans, that found full with her doings; and calling them by a true name, Pyracy, required amends. Yet when their speech was ended, she vouch safed to tell them, That injury in publike shee would doe them none: as for private matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the maner of Kings to forbid their subjects to get commodity, how they best could by Sea. But (faid the younger of the two Embaffadours) we Romans have a maner, and a very laudable one, to take revenge in publike, of those private wrongs that are born out by publike authority: therefore we shall teach you, God willing, to reforme your kingly maners, and learn better of us. These words the Queen took so impatiently, that no revenge could fatisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, she caused him to be slain: as if that had bin the way to fet her heart at rest; which was indeed the mean to disquiet and afflict

The

The Romans, provoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, confisting of two hundred faile, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, ledby A. Posthumus. They trouble not themselves any more with requiring satisfaction: for this injurie is of such nature, as must be requited with mortall war. It is indeed contrary to all humane Law, to use violence towards Embaffadours: the reason and ground whereof. feemes to be this; that fince without mediation, there would never be an end of warre and destruction, therefore it was equally received by all Nations, as a lesson taught by Nature, that Embassadours should passe freely, and in safety, between enemies. Neverthelesse, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King or State lay hold upon Embassadours sent by their enemies, not unto themselves, but unto some 10 third, whom they should draw into the quarrell; then it is as lawfull to use violence to those Embassadors (thus employed to make the war more terrible) as it is to kill the men of war, & fubiects of an enemy. And fo might the Athenians have answered it, when they flew the Laced amonian Embaffadours, that were fent to Xernes, to draw him into a war upon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadours, which practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any law whatsoever. For whereas the true office of an Embassadour residing, is the maintenance of amirie, if it be not lawfull for one Prince to practife against the life of another, much lesse may an Embassadour doe it without incuring justly the same danger of punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place gives him no priviledge at all. But we will leave this 20 dispute to the Civilians; and go on with the revenge, taken by the Romans, for the flaughter of their Embassadour Coruncanus. The Illyrian Queen was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stir against her. She was indeed in an errour, that hath undone many of all forts, greater and leffe than she, both before and since : Having more regard unto fame, than unto the substance of things. The Greeks were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Etolians and Epirots had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had she easily vanquished, and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be little troubled. Hadshe confidered, that her whole Army, which wrought fuch wonders in Greece, was not much greater than of ten thousand men; and that neverthelesse, it prevailed as much by oddes of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; shee would have continued to use her advantage against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that she should not have needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mighty than her selfe. But she was a woman, and did what she listed. She sent forth a greater fleet than before under Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commiffion to take all that could be gotten. This fleet divided it felfe, and one part of it fell with a Dyrrachium, a Dyrrachium, the other with Corcyra. Dyrrachium was almost surprised by the Illyrifomtime called ans; vet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In b Corcyra the Illyrians landed, wasted Epiaamus, and now Duracto, the Isle, and besieged the Towne Hereupon the Etolians and Achaens were called in feated upon the to helpe; who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea: losing, besides others of lesse Adviation to helpe; who came, and were peated in a right at Sea: 10 ling, believes others of lefter adviation for the tweenethelnote, Marcus Carynensis, the first Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus succeeded. The lands of Pharas Towne of Corcyra, difmayed with this overthrow, opened the gates unto Demetriand coreyra.

b coveyra, and - 205 Pharing, who tooke possession of it with an Illyrian Garrison: fending the rest of his landofthe 4- forces to besiege Dyrrachium. In the meane season, Teuta was angry with her Captain Confinand in the. The Romans were even ready to put to Sea, though uncertaine which way to take, postellion of the when advertisement was brought to C. Fulving the Confull, of Demetring his feare and discontent. Likely it was that such an occasion might greatly helpe to advance the bufinesse in hand. Where fore the consult sailed thither; where he found the Towne of Coregra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only received him willingly, but delivered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it felf unto the Roman protection.

After this good beginning, the Confull failed along the coast to Apollonia; accom panied with Demetrius, whom he used thenceforth as his counsellor and guide. To Apol raze upon the lonia came also Posthumus, the other Confull, with the Land-Armie, numbred at twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hasten towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had belieged; but upon newes of the Roman armie they differ fe themselves

From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by sea, take twenty of their ships, and enforce the Queen Tenta to forfake the coast, and to cover her felfe in Rison, far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haste them homeward, and leave the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part staies behind, and profecutes the war, in such fort, that Teuta was forced to beg peace; which she obtained upon miserable conditions; to wit, That she should quit the better part of Illyria, and pay tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth never send any of her ships of war towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Iland of Liffa: except it were some one or two vessels. unarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian war, the Romans fent Embassadours into divers parts of Greece signifying their love to the country, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made war with good successe upon Teuta, and her people. They hoped, belike, that some distressed Ciries would take this occasion, to defire their patronage: which if it hapned, they were wife enough to play their own games. But no fuch matter fell out. The Embaffadours were only rewarded with thanks; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforthmight be partakers of the Ishmian pastimes. This was an idle courtesie, but well meant by the vain Greeks, & therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrianexpedition got nothing in Greece, save a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

Of the war between the Romans and Gaules, somewhat before the comming of Hannibal into Italie.

He Gaules that dwelt in Lombardie, were the next, against whom the Romans tooke Armes. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes with their own forces, and sometimes with the affistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good, when they tooke Rome, and burnt it: though the issue of that war proved not answerable to the beginning, if we may give oredicunto Roman Historians. In following times their successe was variable, and commonly bad. Many overthrowes they received; and if they got any victory, it yeelded them no profit, but was foone extorted out of their hands. They were indeed more fercethan well advised: lightly stirred up to war, and lightly giving over. At the first brunt, they were faid to be more than men; but when that was past, lesse than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience, and knew how to handle them: yet gave alwayes carefull heed to their approach, were it onely bruited. For the danger of them was fudden, and uncertaine; by reason of their neighbourhood and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts upon Rome were called wars, but turnalten Gallici turnults of the Gaules: and rightly . For they gave many alarms 10 Italie, and used to rise with great Armies: but after a few dayes march, and fometimes before their fetting forth, any fmall occasion served to disperse them. Having received moverthrow, they would rest ten or twelve yeares, sometimes twenty or thirty: till they were stirred up again, by younger heads, unacquainted with the danger. Whilest they rested, the state of Rome, that against these made only defensive war, had leisure to grow, by fetting upon others. Herein God provided well for that Monarchie, which he intended to raise: that the Gaules never fell upon Italie with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous war. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilest Pyrhus was travelling in the same enterprise; or in either of the two former Punicke wars: it may be doubted what would have become of this imperious Citie. But it ferns that the Gauls had no better intelligence in the affairs of Italie, than strangers had in Gaule. At least, they knew not how to use their times: and were therefore like to smart, whenfoever the enemies, whom they had much provoked, and little hurt, should finde leisure to visit themat their own home: which was now after the first Punicke Warre. Once before this, the Romans had been bold, to fet upon the Gaules in their own Counmy and that was three yeares before the comming of Pyrrhus into Italie. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gaules, invading Hetruria, and besieging Arretium, had won a great battell, and flaine L. Cacilius, with the most of his Armie. Mannius Curius the new Confull, fem Embaffadours to them, to treat about ransome of prisoners. But these Embassa-

Embassadors they slue. Therfore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followedit fowell, that they expelled these Senones out of their Country, and sent a colonie of a There were their own to inhabit it. This caused the Bojz, another people of Gaule, to scare the like a there were their ownto matter who thereupon tooke armes, and drew the Hetrurians to their fide. But the of the Boje, as in measure: who thereupon to the of the Boje as in measure: who thereby made them fue for peace, Pannonia, Illyia, Romans overthrew them in two great battels; and thereby made them fue for peace, Germany, in Bour- which lasted untill the end of this Illyrran war.

It yexed the Gaules to see a Roman colony planted in their Countrys who had bin acand in Aquitant; but there soji customed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpines (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, thoughto us they were neerer; like as they called Cifalpines, or 10 by-bither the Alpes, those who dwelt between them and the Mountaines) to draw them to their party: reasonably presuming, that as their dis-junction had caused their losse, so their union might recompence it, with large amends. But the businesse was so foolishly carried, that the Cisalpines and Transalpines fell together by the ears, putting the Romans only to a turnult, without further trouble of war. Soone after, they were urged by agreater indignity, to go more substantially to work. For C. Flaminius, a popular manin Rome. proposed a Decree, which was ratified by the people; That, besides one Colony already planted in the territory of the Senones, as many more should be carried thither, as would serve to people the whole Country between Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating utterly those Gaules . Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or 20 Guiana it felf, would not over-joy the Multitude. But the commonalty of Rome took this in so good part, notwithstanding all danger joyned with the benefit, that Flaminus had ever after their good will.

This dreadfull Prefident extremely displeased the Boji; who being neighbours to A. riminum, feared the like displantation. And because the rest of the Gaules had reasonto resolve, that themselves also should be rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Dutchy of Milan, joyned with the Boji, & upon a common purse entertained the Geffates, nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Switzers in these times. The Geffates having received a great imprest, come to the field under the conduct of their Kings Concolinanus and Aneroeftus: who with the Boji and Infubrians, com-3 pound an Armie of fifty thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that ever invaded the Roman Territorie; to whom the Semgalli, that had bin beaten out of their possessions, gave a great increase of strength. On b Cenomanniare the contrary fide, the Venetians, and the Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans as better beleeving in their prosperitie and rising fortune. For feare of whose incursions therefore, the Gaules were forced to leave a good part of their Armie, on the frontier of Milan: fide of theriver with the rest of their forces they entred into Tuscane. The Romans hearing of this dan-Po in Italy.

Therewere al- ger, fend Emilius to Rimine, to stop their passage; and in the place of C. Afilius theirofoof the Come ther Conful, who then was in Sardinia, they imploy one of their Prætors, for the defence

Being at this time greatly troubled with the confideration of this powerfull Armic, which the Gaules had affembled, they caused a view to be taken, as well of all their own forces, as of those of their Allies: who were no lesse willing than themselves, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their owne destruction could not be prevented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserve to be recorded: because they set out the power of the Romans in those dayes. With the Consuls they sent forth to the war foure Legions of their owne: every Legion confilting of five thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse, and of their Allies, thirty thousand foot, and two hundred horse. There were also appointed for supplies (if any misadventure came to these) of the Sabines and 5 Hetrurians fifty thousand foor, and foure thousand horse, which Armie was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the umbri and Sarfinates, which inhabited the Apenines, there were twenty thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomans, other twenty thoufand: which latter Armies were directed to invade the Boji, that forcing them to defend their own Territories, the generall Armie of the Gaules should be thereby greatly diminished. There were besides these, to be ready against all uncertaine chances of warre, thirtie thouland foot, and fifteene hundred horse, garrison'd in Rome it selfe, of their own people; and of their Allies, thirty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Over and above these great troupes; in the Roll of the Lairnes, that was sent unto the Senate, there were numbred fourescore thousand foot, and five thousand horse; in that of the Sammies, seventie thousand foot, and of horse seven thousand; in that of the 3 Japages & Mes- g Japages and Capyges, fifty thousand foot, and fixteene thousand horse; the Lucans sentalist of thir- Messayyes seem tie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Lucans sent a lit of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the harries, k Ferentani, and on; who are althe Vestini, of twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse. The Romans had also two so colled salenLegions in Sicil, and about Tarentum, containing eight thousand four hundred borse. So as of the Romans of contents when the sale of the sale o foure hundred horse. So as of the Romans and Campan's joyntly, reckoning men armed, Calabrians. The and fit to be are armes, there were registred two hundred and fifty thousand foot; and of Country is now hards three and two two two housands of Applia, contains horse three and twenty thousand: of which reckoning the Romans apart, there were an ming the Norhundred and fifty thousand foot, and about fixe thousand horse. Casting up the whole the most land of calibria. forces of all the Provinces in Italie, both of the Romans and their confederates, it amount hap people of ted to seven hundred thousand foot, and seventy thousand horse. But the number is some the kingdom of what mil-cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to enrich himselfe by the dead payes: for Naties. where he reckons nine hundred horse too many, hee fals short nine thousand two hun-thema people dred of the foot.

How great foever this Muster was, it seemes to have been like unto that, which Lodo-campania, calwick Sforza made, when Lewis the twelfth invaded Milan: at what time, the better to led to this day encourage himselfe, and his subjects, he tooke a Roll of all persons able to beare armes, Leander, within the Dutchie, though indeed he were never able to bring a tenth part of them into the field. Certaine it is, that the battels of Trebia, Thrasymene, and Canna, did not confume any fuch proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans faine to arme their flaves,, even for want of other Souldiers, after their overthrow at Canna. Wherefore the marvell is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrefied, with report of fuch a multitude. For all heads are not fit for Helmets: though the Roman Citizens were, in generall, as good fighting men, as elsewhere might befound.

Notwithstanding all these counter-preparations, the Gaules keepe on their way : and entring into Tuscane, destroy, and put to fire and sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to find the Roman's rather in deliberation, than in the field . But their intelligence failes them . For the Roman Army, fent into Tufcane, having taken fome other way than they did, & finding that it had miffed of them. ame againe fast after them to arrest them in their journy. Hereof when they heard the numor, fearing to be charged on their backes, they turned head: and in the fame evening discovered the Roman Army by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparent necessity, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselves with a stratagem: that hewed no great fine neffe of wit, but fuch as well beformed those that had none other ocupation than war; and flood them in good flead at the prefent. In the dead of the night, they cause their foot to march away, but not far, leaving their horse in guard; to whom they give order, to come offat the first light of day, with such a speed, as might rather argue arunning away, than a retrait; as if they had not dared to abide battell. The Romans, interpreting this their hafty departure as the Gaules defired they should, follow them in diforder. The Gaules returne, charge them, and kill fixe thouland upon the place; the rest take a piece of ground of advantage, and defend themselves, till L. Emilia, being at Ariminum, comes to their fuccour. Upon the comming of the Confull, the Gaules confult. whether they should give the Romans battell, or forbeare. In which dispute, Aneroestus, one of their Kings, perswades them, rather to return into their own Countries; where, aftrithey had disposed of the great spoiles and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the war, being without carriage, pefter, or other impediment. This advice they allembrace-for, seeing they that were Mercenaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the spoyles of their enemies, they thought it wisedome, to hazzard neither it, nor themselves, any further.

This indeed had been a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the enemie had beene in fight. But as well in the warres of these later ages, as in former times, it hath ever beene found extreme dangerous, to make a retrait in the Head of an Enemies Army. For although they that retire doe often turne head; yet in alwayes going on from the purfuing enemy, they finde, within a few miles, either streight, hedge, ditch, or place Ordifadvantage, which they are inforced to passe in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier knowes it, as well as the Captaine, that he which for fakes the field, perceives, and feares some advantage of the Enemies. Feare, which is the betrayer of those succours that reafon offereth, when it hath once possess the heart of man, it casteth thence both courage and understanding. They that make the retrait, are alwayes infeare to be abandoned; they that lead the way, feare to be ingaged: and fo the hindmost treads on his heels that is foremost, and consequently, all dis-band, run, and perish, if those that favour the retrain be not held to it by men of great courage. The miserable overthrow that the French received in Naples, in the yeare 1503. upon a retrait made by the Marques of Sal, dothtestifie no lesse. For although a great troupe of French horse sustained the pursuing Enemy a long time, and gave the foot leifure to trotaway; yet being retarded by often tur- 10 nings, the Spanish foot overtooke, and defeated them utterly. During the wars between the Imperials and the French, Boisi and Mont were lost at Brignolles, who in a bravery would needs fee the Enemy, before they left the field. So was Stroft overthrowne by the Marques of Marignan, because he could not be perswaded to dislodge the night before the Marques his arrivall. Therefore did the French King Francis the first wifely: when without respect of point of honour, he dislodged from before Landersey, by night; as many other, the most advised Captaines, (not finding themselves in case to give battell) have done. Jenetrouve point (faith the Marshall Monluc) au fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'une retraitte; I finde nothing in the art of war so difficult as to make a safe retrait. A fure rule it is, that there is leffe dishonour to dislodge in the darke, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof M.de la Noise gives this judgement of a dayes retrait, made in France, presently before the battell at Moncountour, For (faith he) staying upon our reputation, in shew, not to distodge by night; we lost our reputation indeed, by distodging by day: whereby we were forced to fight upon our disadvantage, and to our ruine. And yet did that worthy Gentleman Count Lodowick of Nassau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retrait at Moncountour with fo great resolution, as he saved the one half of the Protestant Army, then broken and disbanded; of which my selfe was an eye-witnesse, and was one of them that had cause to thanke him for it.

Now the Gaules, embracing the safe advice(as they take it) of one of their Kings, turn their backs to the enemy, and their faces homeward. Emilius followes them, as neer as 3 he can, without ingaging himfelte, attending his advantage. In the mean while, C. Atilius the other Confull, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Pifa; fo as the Gaules, inclofed betweene two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Rear and Front. To fustaine Amilius, they appoint the Gessard the Milanois; in the Front they range the Piemontois, and the rest of the Gaules inhabiting upon the River of Po. The manner of the fight Polybim describeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gaules fell; and so did Atilius the Consull: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gaules, Concolitanus and Aneroeftus; with forty thousand of their Vassals.

After this farall overthrow, the Gaules lost courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italie. For they were invaded the yeare following this overthrow, by the new Confuls, Fulvius and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to use their victory: they gave not ten, twentie, or thirtie yeares time to the Gaules, to repaire their forces, as the Gaules had done to them. These new Consuls beat the Boji; but by reason of the great raines that fell, and the great pestilence that reigned, they were compelled for that present to furcease. In the second years, Furius and Flaminius invade the Milanois; and prevailevery far, being strongly assisted by the Cenomanni and the Venetians. Neverthelesse these Confuls were revoked out of their Province, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to refigne their Office: because the Augures; or South sayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all forts of their divination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not onely foreshewed little good, when they were chor sen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiving letters of this revocation from the Senate, and being otherwise advertised of the contents, was not hastic to open them: but first gave battell unto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoyled their theas far as their ambition could reach. Country; then peruled the letters; and returning home obtained a triumph, fore against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that he sided in faction with the Commonaltie, though a man of great No

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for dividing the Country of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, that understanding the Majesty of Rome to be indeed wholly in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by away of Delegacie, or grand Commission, did not stand highly noon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and use their power, over himselfe and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the furer fide, and found imitators, that rose by the same art, which in processe of time, grew the onely or chiefe way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being deposed, M. Claudius Marcellus, & Cn. Cornelius Sapio, were chosen Confuls, for the rest of that yeer. The Gaules about this time defired peace; & were like to have obtained it: though the new Confuls were against it, as feaing to want work. But when thirty thousand of the Geffates, following their King Briumaru, were come over the Alpes, & joyned with the Infubrians: all other discourse. than of present warre, was at an end. So the Confuls hasted into their Province, where they befreged Acerra, a town not farre from Novaro (fo far had the Romans pierced already) in the Duchy of Milan. To divert them from this fiege, Britomarus fat down before Clastidium, a towne in the same Tract, with great part of his forces: leaving the rest. with the Insubrians, to attend upon the Consuls at Acerra, and to looke to the defence of Milan. But this would not fuffice to make the Romans breake up their fiege. Marcellan, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, and fixe hundred foot lightly armed. thought to deale well enough with those at Clastidium. Britomarus heard of the Confiscomming, and met him upon the way: fo fuddenly, that the Komans had no leifure orest themselves after their journy, but were compelled instantly to fight: Herein Briomarus had done well, if he had not forthwith, in a rash bravery, lost his game at a cast. Hehad advantage chough in number, both of horse and foot: but he thought so well of his owne personall valour, that he rode out fingle before his Army, provoking any one with him. Marcellus was no leffe daring than the barbarous King: whether more wile in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to commend him . He flue and difarmed Britomarus, in presence of both Armies: whereby his owne men tooke fuch courage, and his enemies were fo difmaied, that without much would of fight the Romans obtained a great victory.

This was the third and last time, that ever any Roman Generall slue the Generall of heenemies, with his owne hand. To this kinde of victory, belonged a peculiar triumph, whereofonly Romules, Coffus, and this Marcellus, had the honour : yet I dare fay, that the two Scipio's, and divers of the Roman Captaines, especially Cafar, were better man of warre than any of these three; though they never offered up to Jupiter, Opima plias. The Armour of a Generall staine by themselves, when they were Generals, nor per-laps affected fo to doe.

After this victory, Acerra was yeelded to the Romans; & Milan soone after: with all har belonged to the Cifalpines, or Gaules, that dwelt in Lumbardie. Thus was that valiand mighty Nation, that had so many yeers vexed the State of Rome, and in former ims taken the Citie it felfe, brought to nothing in a short time; their pleasant and fertile ferritory possest by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italy, many as would not subject their necks to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon heir Countries, or to hide themselves in the cold and barren Mountaines, like Outwes and Theeves. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twenty yeeres, folwing the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure, that they closed up the Temple of Janus: which they never did before, (it standing alwayes open, when they had any war) fave once, in the reigne of Numa; nor in long time after, untill the reigne of Angustus. But this their present happinesse was not to last long: adangerous warre, and perhaps the greatest that had ever been, was to come unto their which being well ended, they might boldly undertake, to extend their Monar357

CHAP. III. Of the Second Punick Warre.

The warres of Hannibal in Spaine. Quarrels betweene the Romans and Carthaginians. Hannibal befiegeth and taketh Saguntum, whileft the Romans are busted with the Illyrians. Warre proclaimed betweene Rome and Carthage.

ANNIBAL, the fonne of Amilear, was about fixe and twenty yeers old, when he was chosen Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. He was elected by the Armie, as soone as Asdrubal was dead: & the election was ratified by the State of Carthage; wherewith Hanno & his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the third of the Barchine family (so called of Amilcar, whose furname was Barcas) that had command in chiefe, over the men of warre. Which honour would perhaps have beene leffe envied, by these domesticall enemies; if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole fway in government, and beene the onely men regarded, bothby the Senate and the people. This generall good will, as it was first purchased by the most worthy deferts of Amilear, in faving his Country from imminent ruine, inlarging the Dominion thereof, and inriching it with treasures and great revenues; so was it retained, by the fame good arts, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partifans, being neither able to taxe the vertue of their enemies, that was unreproveable; nor to performe the like services unto the Common-weale; had nothing left, whereby to value themselves, excepting the generall reprehension of Warre, and cautelous advice of not provoking the Romans. This they scaloned other-whiles with detraction; saying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppresse the liberty of the City. But their malicious words were unregarded; and if it were factious, to beare ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no leffe Barchine, than Hannibal himselfe. For it was long fince apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the articles of peace, afforded no fecurity to Carthage, were she never so quiet, and officious; unlesse she would yeeld to become their Subject. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than untill the Romans could finde some good advantage, to renew the warre: it was rather defired by the Carthaginians, that whilest their owne state was in good case, the warre should begin; than that in some unhappy time of famine or pestilence, or after some great losse of Army or Fleet, they should be driven to yeeld unto the impudent demands of their enemies; and to give away basely their lands and treasures, as they had lately done; or miserably fight, upon termes of disadvantage.

This disposition of his countrimen, Hannibal well understood. Neither was he ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time devised of this businesse) that in making war with the Romans, it was no small advantage to get the start of them Ifonce he could bring an Arme into Italy, without molestation; there was good hope, that he should finde friends and affistance, even of those people, that helped to increase the Roman armies in forreigne wars. But this could never be effected, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad soever they would be, to heare that he had fet the war on foot, would nevertheleffe be flow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it should happen; then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not onely with the generalities of his purpose, but with fuch particulars as must be discoursed of, in procuring allowance to his designe. This might suffice to disorder the whole Project. Wherefore, he resolved to lay siege unto Saguntum, which might feeme not greatly to concerne the Romans, and would highly please the Carthaginians, that had fresh in minde the indignity of that Spanish Towner alliance with their halfe friends. So should he assaie both the patience of his enemies and the disposition of his owne Citizens.

Having thus concluded, heneverthelesse went faire and orderly to worke: and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approaching unto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (faith Livie) to give some colour to his proceedings: as if he had not principally intended the warre against Saguntum, but had beene drawne thither by course of businesse. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that without regard of such formalities, it was needfull to finish the conquest of the rest, before he did any thing that should provoke the Romans. First therefore hee entred upon the Territory of the * Oleades; and having belieged Althea * A people (Livie calleth it Carteia) their chiefe Citie, he became, in a few dayes, Master not onely (faith Stephanius) neere the thereof, but of all the other Townes of their Countrie. This Nation which he first un-River of Ebro. odertooke, being subdued, and the winter at hand, he rested his Army in new Carthage, But in the old or Carthagena; and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the spoiles he had gotten in his spaine, in Orec.

In the Spring following, he pursued the warre against the * Vaccai: and without any found neere great difficulty, wan first Salmantica, now called Salamanca; and after it, b Arbucala, by Sunday, not far fault: though not without a long fiege, and great difficulty. But in his returne, he was from New Carput to the height, both of his courage, and of his Martiall judgement. For all fuch of the hage Vaccei, as were able to be are armes, being made desperate, by the spoile of their counces, the old. my, with those of Salamanca; and of the Oleades, that had escaped in the late over-Albicala, or throw, joyning themselves with the Toletans; compounded an Army of an hundred in land City of thousand ablemen: and stayed Hannibal on the bankes of the River Tagus, which run- the Vaccai in neth to the Sea by Lisborne in Portugale. These foure Nations, having had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that he never faw enemy, upon whom he durit not give charge; were throughly refolved, that his naturall valour would at this time no leffe reglect the cold advise of discretion, than at other times it had seemed to doe, when the like great occasion perswaded him to use it. But he that makes himselfe a body of Crystall, that all men may looke through him, and discerne all the parts of his dispolition; makes himselfe (withall) an Affe: and thereby teacheth others, either how wide, or drive him. Wife men, though they have fingle hearts in all that is just & vertious; yet they are like Coffers with double bottomes: which when others looke intobeing opened, they see not all that they hold, on the sudden, and at once. It is true, that dissubtile Carthaginian, when he served under Asdrubal, was, of all the men of marke mthe Armie, the most adventurous. But that which may beferme a Captaine, or inseriour Commander, doth not alwaies become a Chiefe; though it hath fometime succeedidwell with such great ones, as have beene found more fortunate, than wise. At this ime, our great Man of warre knew as well how to diffemble his courage, as at other unesto make it good. For he with-drew himselfe from the River-side, as if searefull whord it; thereby to draw over that great multitude, from their bankes of advantge. The Spaniards, apprehending this in such fort, as Hannibal desired that they hould; thruit themselves in furie and disorder, into the swift streame, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for seare) the desenas one the contrary side. But when Hannibal saw them in their way, and well neare over; hee turned backe his Elephants to entertaine them at their landing: and thrust his Horse-men, both above and beneath them, into the River. These carrying a linde of Lance de Gay, sharpe at both ends, which they held in the middest of the haffe; had fuch an advantage over the foor, that were in the River, under their strokes, dattered together, and unable to move or shift their bodies, as on firme ground: that they flue all those, (in a manner) without resistance, which were already entred in-

The saguntines, perceiving the danger towards them; cried before they were hurt. They sent Embassadors to Rome, and bemoaned themselves, as likely to suffer that, which afterwards they suffered indeed; onely because of their alliance and friendship with this honourable City, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moved the Sethe, but much more a report, that Saguntum was already befreged. Hereupon somecry out, that Warre should be proclaimed by Land and Sea; as also that the two Consuls hould be sent with Armies, the one into Spaine, the other into Africk. But others went more Roman-like to worke, and carried it. So it was onely concluded; that Embaffadours should be sent into Spaine, to view the state of their confederates: which were indeed none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre against Rome, it was likely, that he would give them, ere it were long, a more plaufible occasion to take armes against him: if he had no such purpose, yet would it be in their power, to determine what they lifted themselves upon the report of these Embassadours; and this their gravity, in being not too rash at first, would serve to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embassadours Livie reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum, but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybins an Historian of fincerity leffe questio- 10 nable, tells, that they found him at Carthagena, & had conference with him, though such as left them doubtfull. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibal his whole course. And furely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit amore peremptory Embassage (as Livie confesseth) & fall to disputation about the covenants of peace; if they had rejected that which was fent upon none other pretence, than prevention of warre.

Whilest the Embassadours passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not onely his forces. but some Romane pretences, against Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that should doe as the Mamertines in Sicil had done for the Romans; and implore his helpe against the Saguntines. These were the Turdetani, a Nationadjoyning to Saguntum & having many quarrels with them: (as happens commonly among Neighbours) of which, Hannibal himselfe had hatched some. Finding therefore such an occasion, whatfoever it was, as made him able to fay, that the Saguntines had first provoked him, ere he meddled with them; he made no more adoe, but fat down with his whole power before their Towne. He was now more secure, than he had formerly beene, of his owne Cirizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embassadors, with any trembling reverence, as of late yeeres they had been wont. Nevertheleffe, he was glad of any handfome colour, to shadow his actions, not onely because the war, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open enemy, before he could fet foot in Italy. The Romans had the like, though contrary defire. They were glad of the quarrell: as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their owne. Yet were they not hasty to threaten, before they were ready to strike; but meant to temporize, untill they had an Army in readinesse to be sent into Spaine, where they thought to make Saguntum, the searcosthe Warre.

In the meane while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King over a great part of Illyraa-rebelled against them: either for that he found himselfe over-streight-Ty tyed up by them, with hard conditions, or rather because he was of an unthankefull disposition. The commotion of the Gaules, and afterward, the fame of the Carthagans an warre, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to have defended and aided, in all perils, even with the hazzard of his whole estate, which he had received of their gift. But he was a Traitor to his own Queene; and therefore dealt according to his kinde, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First, he built ships, & spoiled the Iles of Greece, against the covenants to which he was bound. Then he adventured further, and feifed upon some places, that the Romans kept in their owne hands. If he had begun fooner, or rather if he had stayed fornewhat longer, he might have spedde better. For the businesse with the Gaules, was ended; with Hannibal, not throughly begun, when hee declared himselse, by his doings, an enemy, and was vanquished. The Roman Conful, Amilia, was sent against him: who in seven dayes wan the strong towne of Dimalum 3 and thereby brought such terrour upon the Country round about, that Embassadours were sent from all places, to yeeld themselves, without putting him to further paines. Onely the City of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to refift: which he might have done long, if the hot-headed Rebell had not beene too foolish. Emilius landed a great part of his Army, in the Isle of Pharus, by night; and bestowed them in covert, presenting himselfe the next morning, with twenty this before the towne, and offering to force the Haven. Demetrius with all his power iffued out against the Consul, & was soone intercluded from the town, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths to a creeke, where he had shipping ready for him, and imbarqued himfelfe: leaving all his effate unto them, of whose liberality he first had it.

This businesse, though it were soone dispatched, yet prevented it not the siege of S_{ab} auntum; before which Hannibal fate downe, ere Amilius was landed in Illyria. In the heginning of the fiege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the brave fallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall received a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many dayes unable to move. Neverthelesse he was not unmindfull of his worke in the meane while; but gave order to raise certaine moveable Towers, that might equall those which were built on the wals of the City; and to prepare to batter the curtaines, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soone wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of divers Towers, and a great length of wall; whereat an hot affault was given: but it was hwell fustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not onely beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Towne, which upon the first fury they hadwon; but they were pursued even to their owne trenches and campe. Neverthelesse. the Carthaginian Army, wherein were about an hundred and fifty thousand men did howearie the townefinen with continuall travaile, that at length it got within the wals and was onely hindred from taking full possession of the City, by some counter-works of the Saguntines, that were also ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alcon assauntine, that conveyed himselfe out of the towne, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were fo fevere, and without all compasse of honour as Alcon durst not returne to propound them to his countrimen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had; gold, filver, plate, and other riches within the Citie: yea, the City it selfe to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that he would affigne some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carry out with them any other thing, wherewith to fultaine themselves, than the cloaths on their backes; or other armes, to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they farre better have submitted themselves unto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might have injoyed their lives, and faved the honour of their wives and daughters) than to have rested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soone after they did by whom their wives and daughters were defloured before their own faces; and all put to fword, that were above fourteen yeeres of age. For it was a poore comfort. which a great number of them tooke; when not daring to fight, and fell their bloud at the dearest rate, they shut themselves up like most wretched creatures in their own hous les, and therein burnt themselves with all that they had: so dying unrevenged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept, therewith to pay his Army : the flaves, and other bootie, he divided among his Souldiers, referving fome things of choice, wherewith to present his friends at Carthage, and to animate them unto the Warre.

These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans, who had good cause to be angry at their own flownesse, in for bearing to fend helpe unto the Saguntanes, that held our eight moneths, looking still for fuccour, but in vaine. Wherefore they determined to repaire their honour, by taking sharpe revenge. To this end they fent Embassadours againe to Carthage: demanding onely, whether it were by generall confent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made warre upon Saguntum: which if they granted (4s ir feemed they would) then to give them defiance. Hereunto answere was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect; That this their fecond Embaffage, how foever qualified with milde words, was indeed more infolent than the former. For in that, they onely required justice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Commonwealth of Carthage, was urged to plead guilty, or not guilty. But (faid the Carthaginian peaker) whether the Generall of our Army in Spaine in belieging Saguntum, have onely followed his owne counfaile; or whether he did it, by direction from us: it is not the question which the Romans ought to aske us. That which is indeed worthy examinationor dispute, is 3 whether it were lawfull or unlawfull, for Hannibal to doe as he hath done. For it belongs to us, to call our own Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults & errors; to you, to challengeus, if we have done any thing contrary to our late League and contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Ludatius the Confull, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement between you and Afdrubal, wherein you will fay, that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that have taught us how to answer that particular. For whatsoever you found in the Treaty between us and Luctatius, to your owne disadvantage, you cast it upon your Confuls prefumption; as promifing those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it be lawfull for the Romans, to difavow the actions of their Confuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punchuall and precise warrant; the same liberty may wee also assume, and hold our selves no way bound in honour, to performe those bargaines, which Asdrabal hath made for us, to without our commandement and confent.

This was an impertinent answer, and little better than a meere cavill. For Luctatine the Conful, in his Treaty of peace with the Carthaginians, had expresly referred theallowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had beene therefore much better, to have dealt plainly; and to have alledged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Isleof Sardinia, and withall of twelve hundred talents: which perjurie the State of Carthage. being now growne able, would revenge with open War. As for the Saguntanes, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacie, and forthwith inferted their names into the Treaty of peace with Asdrubal: seeing that the Treaty with As 20 drubal, and all other businesse betweene Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman injuries, as implying this commination, Doewhat foever we require, elfe will we make Warre, without regard of our eath, which we have already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alledge, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybiss takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet fince Livie himself doth remember and acknow. ledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Amilear with defire of revenge: wee may reasonably thinke, that the mention of this injurie was omitted, not so much upon forgetfulnesse, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping up such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the war, now towards, had long beene thought upon, and like to be made with extraordinary force, in other maner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moved the Roman Embassadors, to deliver unto them in plaine termes the purpoles of those that sent them, and the worlt of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberm; those were but their pretences. Whereupon 2 Fabrus gathering up the skirt of his Gowne, as if somewhat had beene laid in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I have here (quoth he) in my Gowne skirt both Peace and War: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to imbrace. Hereat all cried out at once; Even which of them you your felfe have a fancy to offer us. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the War, and share it among you. Which all the assembly willingly accepted.

This was plaine dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had refolved to make Warre, it was meerely frivolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, have ever bin maintained by the partie unwilling, or unable to fuftaine the Warre. The rufty fword, and the emptie purse, doe alwaies plead performance of covenants. There have been few Kings or States in the World, that have otherwise understood the obligation of a Treaty, than with the condition of their owne advantage: and commonly (feeing peace betweene ambitious Princes and States, is but a kinde of breathing) the best advised have rather begun with the fword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonal with the French in Naples; Henry the second of France, with the Imperials, when he s Wrote to Brefac, to surprise as many places as he could, ere the War brake out; Don John with the Netherlands, and Philip the second of Spaine, with the English, when in the great Imbarge he tooke all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries received from these enemies, had another private and hereditary desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His father Amilear, at what time he did sacrifice, being ready to take his journy into Spaine, had folemnly bound him by oath, to purfue them with immortall hatted, and to worke them all possible mischiese, as soone as he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine yeeres old, when his father caused him to lay his hand upon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no marvelif the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this fort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denied. Yet for mine owne part, I doe not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, have received the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soone as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of England.

6. II.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spaine, and Africke. His journey into Italy.

Arre being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolved not to put up his sword. which he had drawne against the Saguntines, untill he had therewith opened his passage unto the gates of Rome. So began the second Punicke Warre; second to none, that ever the Senate and people of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintred at Carthagena; where he licensed his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the meane while he gave instructions to his brother Afdrubal, for the government of Spaine in his absence. He also tooke order, to fend a great many troups of Spaniards into Africke, to equal the number of Africans formerly drawne thence into Spaine; to the end, that so the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africk thirteene thousand; eight hundred and fifty foot, and twelve hundred horse; also eight hundred slingers of the * Baleares. Besides these he selected soure thousand soot, all * Majorca, & young men, and of qualitie, out of the best Cities of Spaine; which he appointed to be Minorca. garrifond in Carthage it selfe, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might ferve for hostages: for among those foure thousand, the best of the spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their severall States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. He alfoleft with his brother, to guard the coast and Ports, fifty and seven Gallies; whereof thirty seven were presently armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans and other Nations, strangers, he left with him above twelve thousand foote, and two thousand horse, besides one and twenty Elephants.

Having in this fort taken order for the defence of Spaine & Africk; he fent Discoverers before him, to view the Paffages of the Pyrenean Mountaines, and of the Alpes. He also sent Embassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gaules, to obtain aquiet passage: that he might bring his Army entire into Italy, and not be compelled to diminish his forces, by any Warre in the way, till he came to encounter the Romans. His Embaffadours and Discoverers being returned with good satisfaction; in the beginoning of the Spring, he past over the River of Iberm, with an Army consisting of fourescore and ten thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse. All those parts of Spaine anto which he had not entred before, he now fubdued: and appointed Hanno (not that old enemie of his house, who sate still at Carthage) to govern Spaine on the East side of the-1785; to whom he left an Army of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spaine, some of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without afking leave: which that others might not also doe, or attempt, he courteoutly dismissed many more, that feemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to passe, that the journey kemed the leffe tedious unto those that accompanied him; as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his Army, consisting now but of fifty thousand foot, and nine thousand horse, he past the Pyrenes, & entred into Gaule. He found the Gaules that bordered upon Spaine, ready in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Country; but Wonthem, with genrie speech, and rich presents that hee bestowed upon their Leaders, to favour his Expedition. So without any molestation, he came to be the banke of Rhodamis; where dwelt, on each fide of the River, a people called Volca. These were unacquainted with the cause of his comming; and therefore sought to keepe him from pasling over the water. But he was greatly affifted by some of those Gauler, that inhabited on the West fide of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Vivaretz and Lyonnois. For although many of them had transported themselves & their goods, into the Country of Dauphine, thinking to defend the further banke against him: yet such as remained, being very defirous to free their country of so many ill guests, were better pleased to have their Country-men well beaten, which had abandoned them, than to have their owne store of come try-men well beaten, which had abandoned them, than to have their owne store of come and cattell wasted, by the long stay of so great an Army, as lay upon them. For which and cattell wasted, by the long stay of so great an Army, as lay upon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boates; informed him of another more easie passage, reason, they helped him to make boates; informed him of another more easie passage, reason the River: and lent him guides. When the Vessels for transportion of his Arhigher up the River; and lent him guides. When the Vessels sup the River: himsels in the my were in readingssels he sent Hanno, the son of Bomilear, up the River: himsels in the meane while making countenance to enter the Foord below. The end of this labour, was: that Hanno charging the Gaules unawares upon their owne side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passage the River in their faces, the further banke was won, though with the same time, passage the River in their faces, the further banke was won, though with the same time, passage the enemies dispersed. Yet was he greatly troubled in conveying some dissillations, and the enemies dispersed. Yet was he greatly troubled in conveying some dissillations, and the enemies dispersed the water. He was therefore driven to over his Elephants; who marvellously search and Turse; whereof he fastened one to make raffes of trees, and cover them with earth and Turse; whereof he fastened one to make raffes of trees, and cover them with earth and Turse; whereof he fastened one to make raffes of trees, and cover them with earth and Turse; whereof he fastened one to make raffes of trees, and cover them with earth and Turse; whereof he fastened one to make raffes of trees, and cover them with earth and Turse; whereof he faste

Having past this first brunt, and over-come both the rage of the River, and of those that defend it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gaules Cifalpines, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Romans. These informed him of the passages of the Alpes; that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; and from these he received guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwith- 20 standing, he found himselfe extremely incombred by the Savoyans; and lost, both of his carriages, and of this Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainely assailed by them, before he could recover the plaine Countries on the other side. And whereas this journey over the Mountaines cost him fifteene dayes travaile, he was every day, more or lesse, not onely charged by those Mountainers, but withall extremely beaten with grievous weather and fnow: it being the beginning of Winter, when hee began, and over-came this passage. But the faire and fertile Plaines, which were now ready to receive them; with the affistance and conduct of the Cifalpine Gaules, who by their proper forces had so often invaded the Roman Territory: gave them great comfort and encouragement to goe on: 30 having nothing else of difficulty remaining, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to over-come, by their proper valour and resolution; namely, the Roman Armies, and refistance.

6. III.

How the Romans invaine solicited the Spaniards and Gaules to take their part. The rebellion of the Cisalpine Gaules against the Romans.

He Countries of Spaine and Gaule, through which the Cathaginians marched thus farre, had beene solicited before, by the same Roman Embassadours, who had denounced the warre at Carthage. These, as they were instructed by the Senate, tooke Spane in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Ciries and Princes as they could; at least to diffwade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volcians, a people in Spaine; from whom, in open affembly, they received by one that spake for the rest, this uncomfortable answer: With what face (faith he) can ye Romans perswade us to value your Alliance, or to prefer it before the friendship of the Carthaginans; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, tobe more wife than lo: For they, relying on your faith and promifed affiftance, have been utterly rooted out, & destroyed by the Carthaginians; whom they might else have held their assured friends, and good neighbours, as wee, and other the people of Spaine have found them. Ye may therefore be gone, with this resolution from us, That for our parts (and so I thinke, I may answer for the rest of our Country-men) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindnesse at our hands; who are resolved, never to make account of their protection, nor amity. From the Volcians, the Embassadors tooke their way to wards the Gaules; using their best arguments to perswade them not to suffer the Cartha ginians to passe into Italy, through their Territory : and withall greatly glorifying them felves, their strength; and large Dominion. But the Gaules laught them to scorne, and had hardly the patience, to heare them speake. For shall we (said one of their Princes) by resisting Hannibals passage into Italy, entertaine a war which is not meant to be made against us? Shall we hold the warre among our selves, and in our owne Territory, by the Romans deserved so well of us, & the Carthaginians so ill, that we should set fire on our owne houses, to save theirs from burning? No, weeknow it well, that the Romans have already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territory and inheritance; and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not not weethem.

With this unpleasing answer the Embassadours returned home : carrying no good newes, of friends likely to helpe them; but rather some assurance from the people of Massilia, which were confederates with Rome, that the Gaules were determined to take part with their enemie. Of this inclination, the Cifalpine Gaules gave haltie proofe. For when the newes was brought into Italy, that the Carthaginians had paffed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stirre up the Bon, and Infubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore upon the Carthaginian succour, which they supposed to be now at hand; they laid asside all regard of those hostages, which they had given to the Romans, and fell upon the new Colonies. The Townes it seemes they could not winne; for Hannibal shortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Countrie) to flie to Modena: where they befieged them. The fiege of Modena had continued some small time; when the Gaules, having little skill in assaulting Cities, waxed wearie, & seemed desirous to have peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting; that they might thereinlay hand upon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeeme their Hostages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wish. For the Romans sent out Embaffadours to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detained. Manlius the Prætor, who lay in these quarters with an Army, hearing this outrage; marched in all haste to the reliefe of the besieged. But the Gaules, having laid a strong ambush in a wood joyning to the way, fell upon the Prætor fo opportunely, as hee was utterly overthrowne, and all his followers left dead in the place, a few excepted, that recovered, by fall running, a little village, but defensible; upon the River of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Atilius, another of the Prætors, was hastily sent, to relieve the besieged, with a Legion, and five thousand of the Roman affociates: which forces were taken out of the Confuls Army, and supplied by a new levie.

As the Gaules were too rash and hastie: so were the Romans too slow, and indeed too ill-advised, in the beginning of this warre. They were not perswaded, that Carthage, which had almost servilely endured so many indignities, in time of the late peace; would be so brave and couragious on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italie it selfe. Wherefore they appointed one of their Confuls, to make warre in Spaine, the other in Africke: resting secure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius tooke his way toward Africke, with an hundred and fixty Quinqueremes, or Gallies of five to an oare, which preparation may feem to threaten even the Citie of Carthage, to which it shall not come Reie. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Conful, made all possible haste, by the way of Gema, into Provence; and used such diligence, having the winde also favourable, as in five dies he recovered Massilia. There he was advertised, of Hannibal his having passed the River of Rhodanus, whom he thought to have found busie yet a while in Spaine. Hanmbalhad alfo newes of the Confuls arrivall: whereof he was neither glad, nor forry, as not meaning to have to doe with him. Each of them fent forth Scouts, to discover the others number and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly bragge, having flaine onely two hundred, and loft of their owne, one hundred and forty. But when Scipio drew neere, have met with the Carthaginians; he found, that they were gone three dayes before; ad that (as he then found affuredly true) with an intent to looke upon the wals of Rome.

This

This interrupted his intended voyage into Spaine. Neverthelesse hee sent away thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his fleet and Army, to trie what might be done against Afdrubal & the other Carthaginian Lievtenants in that Country. He himselfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Pisa; and so passing through Tuscane into Lombardie, drew together the broken troups of Manlin & Atilius that lately had bin beaten by the Gaules: with which forces he made head against the enemie, thinking to finde him over-laboured, with travaile of his painefull journey.

6. IV.

Scipio the Romane Conful overcome by Hannibal at Ticinum. Both of the Romane Consuls beaten by Hannibal, in a great battell at Trebia.

Tive Moneths Hannibal had fpent in his redious journey from Carthagena; what great muster he could make, when he had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. great matter the content an hundred thousand, and his horse at twenty thousand, Some reckon his foote at an hundred thousand, and his horse at twenty thousand, others report them to have beene onely twenty thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse. Hannibal himselfe, in his Monument which he raised, in the Temple of Juno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter summe. Yet the Gaules, Ligurians, and others that joyned with him, are likely to have mightily increased his Army, in short space. But when hee mar- 20 ched Eastward from the bankes of Rhodansu, he had with him eight and thirty thousand foot, & eight thousand horse; of which, all save those remembred by himselfe in the Inscription of his Altar in Juno's Temple, are like to have perished, by diseases, enemies, Rivers, and Mountaines; which mischiefes had devoured, each, their severall shares.

Having newly passed the Alpes, and scarce refreshed his wearied Army in the Countrie of Piement; hee fought to win the friendship of the Taurini, who lay next in his These dwelt way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Insubrians, which were his good , friends; and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amity. Wherefore he assaulted their Towne; and wanne it by force in three daies. Their spoile served well to hearten unto the Duke his Army; and their calamity, to terrefie the Neighbour places. So the Gaules, without of Savoy: which orsavoy: which from them took more adoe, fell unto his fide: many for feare, many also for good-will, according to their former inclination. This disposition ranne through the whole Country: which joyned, or was all in readinesse to joyne with the Carthaginians; when the newesof Scipio the Conful his arrivall, made some to be more advised, than the rest. The name of the Romans was terrible in those quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Conful was already gotten through the most defensible passages, ere any speech had beene heard of his approach: many sate still for very feare, who else would faine have concluded a League with these new-come friends; and some, for greater feare, offered their service against the Carthaginians, whom nevertheleffe they had wished well to speed.

This wavering affection of the Province, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals haften to the triall of a battaile. Their meeting was a Ticinum, now called Pavia; where each of them wondred at the others expedition: Hannibal thinking it strange that the Conful, whom he had left behinde him on the other fide of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before he had well warmed himselfe in the Plaines; Scipio admiring the strange adventure of passing those Mountaines, and the great spirit of his Enemie. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed at Hannibals successe, and sudden arrivall. Wherefore they dispatched a Messenger in all haste unto Sempronius, the other Conful, that was then in Szerlea, giving him to understand hereof: & letting him further know, that whereas he had bin directed to make the warre in Africa, it was now their pleasure that he should forbeare to prosecute any such attempt, but that he should return the Army under his charge, with all possible speed, to save Italy it selfe. According to this order, Sempronius fent off his Fleet from Libbeum; with direction to land the Army at Arminum, a Port Towns not farre from Ravenna: quite another way from Car thage, whither he was making halte. In the meane while, Scipio & Hannibal were com fo neere, that fight they must, ere they could part asunder. Hereupon, both of then prepared the mindes of their Souldiers, by the best arguments they had: unto which Hamibal added the Rhetoricke of a present example, that hee shewed upon certain prisoners of the Savoyans, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italy. For these, having beene no lesse miserably settered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their defire, than to bee delivered from their miseries by any kinde of present death, were brought into the middle of the Army: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were flaine, with condition, being the Victor, to receive his liberty, and some small reward. This was no fooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftaines of the Gaules were wont to use in fingle combats. Every one of these unhappy men wished, that his owne lot might speed; whereby it should at least bee his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victory. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolvedly: as rather desiring, than feaing death; and having none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poore creatures were willing, upon what soever uneven termes, to ridde themselves out of slaverie. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellowes which beheld them, wrought also upon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the victory had gotten his liberty, together with an horse and armour: but even him also, who being staine in fight, had escaped that miserable condition, unto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiving what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them, began to admonish them of their owne condition, speaking to this effect: That hee had laid before them an example of their owne estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the ame fortune, that these slaves had done; all to live victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed farre more grievous) to live in a perpetuall slaverie: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himselse any hope of life by flight; fince the Mountaines, the Rivers, the great distance from their owne Countries, and the pursuit of mercileffe Enemies, must needs retrench all such impotent imaginations. He therefore prayed them to remember, that they, who had even now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their owne case; seeing that there was never any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, that had ever bin broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrary, hee told hem that the Romans, who were to fight upon their owne foile, & in view of their owne Townes; who knew as many wayes to fave themselves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertaine such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same meeffity, (to which nothing feemes impossible) did no way presse them, or constraine them. In this fort did Hannebal, with one substantiall argument, That there was no meane httweene victory and Death, encourage his Companions. For, (faith a great Captaine of France) La commodité de la retraitte advance la fuite; The commodity of a retrait, doth greatly advance a flat running away.

Scipio on the other fide, after that he had given order for the laying of a bridge over the River of Ticenus, did not neglect to use the best arguments and reasons he could, to acourage the Army he led: putting them in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had prevailed; and over how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Army commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late warre they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he praied them withall to confider, that at this time it was not onely fo diminished in numbers, as it rather feemed a troupe of Brigants and Theeves, than an Army likely to encounter the Romans, but so weather-beaten, and starved, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustaine the first charge that should be given upon them. Nay (faid he) yee Your felves may make judgement what daring they have now remaining, after formany travailes and miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Reane, their horse-men were not onely beaten by ours, and driven back to the very Trenches of their Camp, but Hannibal himselse, fearing our approach, ranne head-long lowards the Alpes: thinking it a leffe dishonour, to die there by frost, samine, and pre-(upitation, than by the sharpe swords of the Romans, which had so often cut downe his people, both in Africa, and in Sicil. It was not long after this, ere the two Generals met: each being far advanced before the groffe of his Army, with his Horfe; and the Roman having also with him some light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies counrenance. When they discovered the approach one of the other; Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gaules, to begin the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the voide ground betweene their troupes , to affift them : himselfe with his Roman men at armes. followed foftly in good order. The Gaules (whether defirous to trie the metall of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get favour of the Romans) behaved themselves conragiously, and were as couragiously opposed. Yet their foot that should have aided them. thranke at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for feare 10 of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding the Gaules maintained the fight, and did more hurt than they received as prefuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Confull unmindfull to relieve them: their hardinesse deserving his aide; and the haftie flight of those that should have stood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore he adventured himselfe so farre, that he received a dangerous wound; and had been eleft in the place, if his sonne (afterward surnamed Africanus') had not brought him off: though others give the honour of this refcue to a Liquinan flave. Whilest the Romans were busied in helping their Confull; an unexpected storme came driving at their backes, and made them looke about how to helpe themselves. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to give upon the Romans in 20. flanke, and to compaffe them about, whilest hee with his men at Armes sustained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the scattered foot, that ranne away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose lookes were fastened upon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were shuffled together, and routed: so that they all betooke them to their fpeed, and left unto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio faw his horsementhus beaten, and the rest of his Army thereby greatly discouraged; he thought it a point of Wisedome, having lost so many of his Fleet upon the first puffe of the winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extremest of the tempest overtooke him. For he saw by the lowring morning what manner of day it was like , to prove. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet unbroken, he in a manner stole the retrait; and recovered the bridge over Ticinus, which he had formerly built. But notwith standing all the haste that he made, he left fixe hundred of his Reare behinde him: who were the last that should have passed; and staid to breake the bridge. Hereinhe sollowed this rule of a good man of war, Si certamen quando que dubium videatur, tacitam miles arripiat fugam : fuga enim aliquando laudanda : which must be understood in this fort: If a Generall of an Army, by some unprosperous beginnings doubt the successe; or sinde his Army fearefull or wavering, it is more profitable to feale a fafe retrait, than to abide the uncertaine event of battaile.

It was two daies after, ere Hannibal could paffe the River; Scipio the whilest refreshing his men, and easing himselfe of his wound in Placentia. But as soone as Hannibal presented his Army before the Towne, offering battaile to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor iffue forth of their Campesthe Gaules, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, gathered out of his feare, courage to forfake him. They thought that now the long-defired time was come, in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Ameroestus, Britomarus, & Geffates, were come to helpe them; if they had the hearts to helpe themselves. Wherefore the same night they fell upon the Roman Campe; wounded and slue many; especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they fled over to the Carthaginians, & presented their service. Hannibal received them exceeding courteoutly, and difinish them to their owne places: as men likely to bee of more use to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Consederates, than in any other fervice at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Confull stole a retrait, as he had done before; but not with the like ease and security. Hannibal had a good eye upon him, and ere he could get farre, sent the Numidians after him: following himselfe with all his Army. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedy of spoile, had not staid to ransacke their campe; & thereby given time to all, save some sew in Reare, that were flaine or taken, to passe the River of Trebia, and save themselves.

being both unable to travell by reason of his wound, and withall, finding it expedient to attend the comming of his fellow-Conful; incampes himselfe strongly upon the bankes of Trebia. Necessitie required that he should so doe; yet this diminished his reputation. For every day more and more of the Gaules fell to the Carthaginian fide; among whom came in the Boji, that brought with them the Roman Commissioners, which they had taken in the late Insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as pledges, to redeeme their own hostages: but now they deliver them up to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whose help they conceived better hope of recovering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great scarcity of victuals, mattempted the taking of Clastidium, a Towne wherein the Romans had laid up all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundusian, whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, fold it for a little money.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with a defire of hasty revenge, than any great forrow for their losse received; feeing that in a manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore hasted away Sempronius, that was newly arrived, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him fent out of Sicil, awaited his comming. Hee therefore hafted thither; and from thence he marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him upon the bankes of Trebia. Both the Armies being joyned in one, the Confuls devised pabout that which remained to be done: Semproniu receiving from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibals arrivall; the fortune of the late sight; and by what error ormifadventure the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the revolt and treason of the Gaules.

Sempronius, having received from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts; sought by all meanes to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glory of the victory, which hehad already, in his imagination, certainely obtained. Hee also feared the election of the new Consuls: his owne time being well-neere expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrarie; objecting the unskilfulnesse of the new-come fouldiers : and withall, gave him pgood reason, to assure him that the Gaules, naturally unconstant, were upon termes of abandoning the party of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting between the rivers of Trebia and Po, being already revolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made hafte to find out the dishonour which he might otherwise easily have avoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleafing to Hannibal: who feared nothing fo much as delay and losse of time. For the strength of his Armie, confishing in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gaules; he no leffe feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatience of the other: who being farre from their owne home, had many passions moving them to turne their faces towards it. To further the defire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gaules, inhabiting neere unto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthagimans. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as he supposed that they might have done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their akes, and to set them at libertie, he had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was bold to be his owne Carver; and took from hem by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they flie to the Romans for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, fay that this wrong is done them, because they refused to joyne with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: he suspeded their falshood, and was affured of their mutability. But Sempronius affirmed, that it food with the honour of Rome, to preserve their Confederates from suffering injurie: and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Gaules. Therefore he sent out a thousand horse: which comming unlooked for upon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them heavie loaden, cut many of them in pieces, and chaced the rest even into their own campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians fallie out against them: who caused them to retire faster than they came. Sempronius was ready to back his owne men; and spelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Armic Was drawne forth; and a battell ready to bee fought, if the Carthaginian had not redefirous to trie the maine chance in open field: all the perswasions of Scipto to the contrarie not withstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was advertised by the Gauls, his spies. that were in the Roman Campe. Therefore he bethought himselfe how to help forward the victorie, by adding some stratagem to his forces: he found in the hollow of a watercourse, over-growne with high reed, a fit trench to cover an ambush. Therein he cast his brother Mago with a thousand choyce horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Armie. after they had well warmed, and well fed themselves in their campe, he led into the field. and marched towards the Conful. Early in the morning, he had fent over Trebia some companies of Numidian light-horse, to brave the enemie, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was ready to take any opportuity to fight: 10 and therefore not onely issued out of his Campe, but foorded the River of Trebia, ina most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arme-holes: which, together with the want of food, did fo enfeeble and cool their courages: as they wanted force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Latines: having of the one fixteene, of the other twenty thousand. The masse of these they ranged in a grosse Battalion, guarded on the slanks with three thousand hosse, thrusting their light-armed, and Darters, in loose troups in the head of the rest, in thenature of a Vantguard. The Caribaginzan numbers of foot were in a manner equall to their enemies; in horse they had by far the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Numidians; 20 when their foot were charged both in front and flanke, by the Spaniards, Gaules, and Elephants; when finally the whole Armie was unawares prest in the Reare, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush; then fell the Romans, by heaps, under the enemies swords and being beaten down, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the River, by the horsemen that pursued them, there escaped no more of six and thirty thousand, than ten thousand of all forts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errours Sempronius committed, of which every one deserved to be recompenced with the loffe that followed. The first was, that he fought with Hannibalin a Champaine, being by far inferiour in horse, and withall, thereby subject to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or un-even grounds and wood-lands, would have bin of no use. His second error was, that he made no discoverie of the place upon which he fought; whereby he was groffely over-reacht, and infnared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that he drencht his footmen with empty stomacks, in the River of Trebia, even in a most cold and frostie day, whereby, in effect, they lost the use of their limbs. For, as one faith well, There is nothing more inconvenient and perillow, than to prefent an armietyred with travell, to an enemy fresh and fed; sincewhere the strength of body faileth, the generositie of minde is but as an unprositable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armie, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia; ftealing away the fame night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Caribaginians, who either perceived him not, because of the showres; or would not perceive him, because they were over-wearied. Sempronius escaped with extreme danger, flying through the Countrie that was over-run by the enemies horse. He was attended by more, than were requisite in a secret slight; yet by fewer, than could have made resistance, if the enemy had met with him. Neverthelesse he got away, and came to Rome, where he did his office in choosing new Consuls for the yeere following: and then returned into his Province, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

The departure of Hannibal from the Cifalpine Gaules into Hetruria. Flaminius the Roman Consul flaine, and his Armie destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymene.

He Winter growing on apace, was very sharpe, and unfit for service: to the great contentment of the Romans, who, being not able to keepe the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not fuffer them to reft very quiet; but vexed them with continuall Alarmes: affayling divers places, and tavery quiet; but vexed them with continual Alarmes; analy ing cives place; particle a write, and itay for his Colleague. But of this hee could not abide to king fome; beating the Gaules their adherents, and write the Ligurians to his particle awing, that hee came not to defend Arreium, whilefi the Carthaginians were

Treasurers, two Colonels, and five Gentlemen, the Sons of Senators, which they had intercepted. Thefe, and in general all fuch prisoners as he had of the Komans, he held in freight places, loaden with irons, and miserably fed: those of their followers hee not onely well intreated, but fent them to their Countries without ransome; with this protestation, That he therefore undertooke the Warre in Italie, to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these meanes hee hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and affishance. But the Gandes were not capable of fuch perswahons. They stood in seare, lest he should make their Countrie the seat of War, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieved than reason willed them, at his feeding upon them, and wasting their tetritorie. Wherefore some of them conspired against o his life ; others admonished him of the danger : and these that gave him the advice, were ready foon after to practife against him ; but were in like fort detected. He was therefore glad to use Perwigs of haire, and false beards of divers colours; to the end, that he might not be descried, nor knowne, to those that should undertake to make him away. Faine he would have passed the Appenines, upon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gaules, till he had feene more fivallowes than one. At length, when the yeare was somewhat better opened, he resolved to take his leave of thefe giddie companions, & bring the war neerer to the gates of Rome So away hewent, having his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gaules; more serviceable friends abroad, than in their own Countrie. That the paffage of the Appenine Mounraines was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet since the Roman Annies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way : the great vestaon which fell upon Hannibal, when he was travelling through and over them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter, that makes all wayes foule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that journey . Nevertheleffe, to avoide the length of way, together with the refistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to have beene erected upon the ordinary paffages towards Rome! he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to travell through the Fennes and rotten grounds of Tuscane. In those Marishes and bogges, he lost all his Elephants, swe one, toget ther with the use of one of his eyes; by the moystnesse of the ayre, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deepe mire and water. In briefe, after hee had with much adoe recovered the firme and ferrile Plaines; who lodged about Arreinnes; where he somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the Roman

C.Flaminius, and Cn. Servilius had of late bin chosen Consuls for this year: Servilius atractable man, and wholly governed by advice of the Senate; Flaminius an hot-headed popular Orator; who having once been robbed (as he thought) of his Confulfitip, by a divice of the Senators, was afraid to be served so againe, unlesse he quickly finished the war. This jealous Conful thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entred into his Office, left his adversaries, by faining some religious impediment, should detaine him within the Citie, or find other businesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour that he hoped to get in the war. Wherefore he departed fecretly out of the Town; and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came, at Ariminum. The Fathers (fo the Senarors were called) highly displeased with this, revoked him by Embassadors : but leneglected their injunction; and hasting to meet with the Carthaginians, took his way to Arrecium, where he shortly found them.

The fierie disposition of this Consul, promised unto Hannibal great assurance of victothe. Therefore he provoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman: hoping thereby to draw him unto fight, ere Servilius came with the reft of the Armie. All the Countrie between Fefula and Arreisum he put to fire and fword, even under the Confuls nofe; which was enough to make him stirre, that would not have fitten still, though Hannibal had been quiet. It is true that a great Captaine of France hath faid; Pas gasten' est pas perdu; A masted Countrie is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Countrie, Flaminius thought his owne honour to bee much impaired; and therebreadvanced rowards the Enemie. Many advised him (which had indeed been best) whave patience a while, and stay for his Colleague. But of this hee could not abide to king fome; beating the Gaules their adherents, and winning the Light who prefented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Questors, of the prefented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Questors, of the prefented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Questors, of the prefented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Questors, of the prefented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Questors, of the prefented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Questors, of the prefented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Questors, of the prefented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Questors, of the prefented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Questors, of the prefented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Questors, of the prefented him, in token of the prefented him, i and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Enfigues stucke so saft in the ground, as it could not be plucked up by the Ensigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tully makes a jeast; saying, That the cowardly knave diddfaintly pull at it (asgoing now to fight) having hardly pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto: for he commanded, that it should be digged up, if search and made the hands too weaker o lift it: asking withall, whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this their jealousie, both he and the Senate that did give him cause, are likely to

All the Territorie of Cortona, as far as to the Lake of Thrasymene, was on a light fire; which whilest the Consult thought to quench with his enemies bloud, he pursued H_{an-} nibal so unadvisedly, that he fell with his whole Armie into an ambush cunningly layd for him, betweene the Mountaines of Cortona and the Lake. There was he charged unawares, on all fides, (fave onely where that great Lake of Perusia permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flye from them) knowing not which way to turne.or make refistance. So was he flaine in the place, accompanied with fifteene thousand dead carkaffes of his Countrimen. About fixe thou fand of his men, that had the Vantguard tooke courage, as for the most part it happens, out of desperation; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way, recovered the tops of the Mountaines. If these had returned, and given charge upon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might 26 have greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their feare, which, kindled by necessity, had wrought the effects of hardinesse, was wellaffwaged, when they ceafed to despaire of faving their lives by flight. They flood still, in a cold sweat, upon the Hill-top, hearing under them a terrible noise, but not any way discovering how things went, because of the great foggethat held all that morning. When it grew toward noone the ayre was cleered, and they might plainely difcerne the lamentable flaughter of their fellowes. But they flayd not to lamentit: for it was high time, they thought, to be gone crethey were deferred and attached by the enemies horfe. This they should have thought upon sooner, since they had no minde to returne unto the fight. For descried they were, and Maharbal sent after them; who over-tooke them by night in a Village, which he furrounded with his horse: and so they yeelded the next day, rendring up their armes, upon his promife of their lives and liber-

This accord Hannibal refused to confirme; saying, That it was made by Maharbal without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authority to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith : and fitted them with a trick of their owne. For if it were lawfull unto the Romans, to alter covenants, or adde unto them what they lifted; if the Carthaginians must be faine to pay certaine hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, besides their first bargaine; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and be limited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present advantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal be as a Roman, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidiousnesse gaineth no more in prosperitie, than it loseth in the change of fortune. Fifteene thousand Italian prisoners, or thereabout, he had in his hands: of which, all that were not Romans, he fet free without ransome; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their fakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had undertaken this war. But the Romans hee kept in ftreight prifon, and in fetters, making them learne to eat hard meat. This was a good way to breed in the people of Italie, if not alove of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this war had not concerned the generall fafetie, but onely the preferving of her owne necke from the yoke of flaverie, which her over-firong enemies would thrust upon her in revenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by successe of many ages, is not lost in one or two battels. Wherefore more is to be done, ere the Carthaginians canget any Italian Partifans.

Presently after the battell of Thrasymene, C. Centronius, with soure thousand Roman horse, drew neere unto the Campe of Hannibal. He was sent from Ariminum by Servilius the other Consul, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but, comming too late, be increased only the misadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this companie; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great overthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost halfe of them, drave the rest unto an high piece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yeelded to mercie the next day. Servilins himselfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Gaules; against whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes was brought him of his Colleagues overthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him hassen backe to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easieto discerne the fruits of popular jealousie, which perswaded the Romans to the yearely change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatoly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all men are fire better taught by their owne errours, than by the examples of their foregoers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had beene taken up but the yeare before by this subtle Carthaginian; yet suffered hee himselfe to be caught soone after in the same manner. Hee had also belike forgotten, how sempronius, searing to be prevented by a new Conful, and ambitious of the fole honour of beating Hannibal in battell, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had beene rewarded with shame and losse: else would be not, contrarie to all good advice, have beene so hastie to fight, before the arrivall of servilius. If Sempronius had been continued in his charge, it is probable that he would have aken his companion with him the second time, and have searched all suspected places, proper to have shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his government of France ten years, (efar brought that mighty Nation, together with the Helvetians and many of the Germans, under the Roman yoke; into which parts had there beene every yeare a new Lievtenant sent, they would hardly, if ever, have beene subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to informe it selse, within one yeares compasse, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions of the Places, Rivers, and of all good helpes, whereby to profecute a war to the best effect. Our Princes have commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three years; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them have returned as wife as they went out; others have profited more, and yet when they plugan but to know the first rudiments of War, and government, fitting the Country, they have bin called home, & new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath ever beene the course of the World rather to follow olderrours than to examine them: and of Princes and Governours, to uphold their flothfillignorance, by the old examples and policie of other ages and people; though neither kenesse of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, have perswaded the imitation.

§. V I.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Distator, sought to consume the force of Hannibal, by lingring war. Minutius the Master of the Horse, honoured and advanced by the People, for bold and success of the antempting; adventures rashly upon Hannibal, and is like to perish with bis Armie, but rescued by Fabius.

Reatly were the Romans amazed at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparent; which threatned them in more terrible manner, than ever did war, since Rome it selfe was taken. They were good Souldiers; and so little accustomed between an overthrow, that when Pyrrhm had beaten them, once and againe, in open sied, all Italy was strangely affected with his successe, and held him in admiration, as one that could worke wonders. But Pyrrhm his quarrell was not grounded upon hate: hee only sought honour, and fought (as it were) upon a braverie: demeaning himselfe like a courteous enemie. This Carthagiman detested the whole Roman name; against which he burned with desire of revenge. Treinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his abilitie. Which to withstand, they fled unto a remedie that had long bin out of use, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subject unto controll of the whole Citie. Wherefore this Officer was seldome chosen, but upon some extremitie, and for no longer time than fixe moneths. Hee was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consuls is prerogative) might name whom he pleased. At this time the Tttt 3

one Conful being dead, and the other too farre off, the People tooke upon them, as having supreme authoritie, to give the Dignity by their election, to 2. Fabius Maximus; the best reputed man of war in the Citie . Novum factum novum consilium expetit. Contrarie windes, contrarie courses. 2. Fabius chose M. Minuius Rufus Master of the horse which Officer was customarily as the Dictators Lievtenant; though this Minuius grew afterwards famous, by taking more upon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somwhat amisse in matter of Religion: a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion beene also good. But if it were true (as Livie reports it) that the Bookes of Sybil were consulted, and gave direction in this businesse of devotion; then must we believe, that those books of Sybil, preserved in 10 Rome, were dictated by an evill spirit. For it was ordained, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this warre to Mars, should be made anew, and amplified; as having not bin rightly made before : also that great playes should be vowed unto Jupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with such other trumperie. This vehemencie of superstition, proceeds alwaies from vehemencie of feare. And furely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distempered with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they faw their fons returnealive from Thrasymene, may serve to beare witnesse; though it be more properly an example of motherly love. The walls and towers of the Citie were now repaired and fortified; the bridges upon Rivers were broken downe; and all care taken for defence of Rome it felfe. In this tumult, when the Dictator 26 was newly fet forth against Hannibal; word was brought that the Carthaginian fleethad intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scapio in Spaine. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Servilius the Conful to put to Sea; and taking up all the ships about Rome and Ofia, to purfue them: whilest he, with the Legions, attended upon Hannibal. Foure Legions he had levied in haste: and from Arimnum he received the army, which Servilius the Conful had conducted thither.

With these forth-with he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what advantage the Numidian horse had over the Romans, he alwayes lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard accesse. Hannibal in the meane while, pursuing his victorie, had ranged over all the Countrie, and used all manner of 3 cruelty towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whomhe did put to the sword, all that were able to bear arms. Passing by Spoletum and Ancona,he incamped upon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and over-travelled Companies, armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans, and made his dispatches for Carthage; presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoiles that he had gotten. Having refreshed his army, fed his horses, cured his wounded Souldiers, and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse heels of the scratches, by washing their pasternes in old wine : he followed the coast of the Adrianick Sea towards Apulia, 2 Northerne Province of the Kingdome of Naples ; spoiling the Marrucini, and allother Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he over-ran, he had not taken any one Citie: onely he had affaied Spoleium, a Colonie of the Romans; and finding it welldefended, presently gave it over. The malice of a great Armie is broken, and the forceofit spent in a great siege. This the Protestant Armie found true at Poistiers, a little before the battel of Moncountour; and their victorious enemies, anon after, at S. Jean d' Angely. But Hannibal was more wife. He would not engage himselse in any such enterprise, as should detaine him, and give the Romans leave to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation : knowing, that when once he was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end he presented Fabius with battell, as soon as he saw him; and provoked him with all manner of bravadoes. But Fabius would not bite. He well knew the differences between fouldiers bred up, ever fince they were Boyes, in wat well knew the differences between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the differences between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the differences between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the differences between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the differences between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the differences between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the differences between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the differences between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the differences between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the differences between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the difference between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the difference between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the difference between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the difference between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the difference between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the difference between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the difference between foundiers bred up, ever fine truly well knew the difference between foundiers bred to do e, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extreme perill and in bloud, trained and nardefied in spain, made productions, and fuch, as had no of-weath. But the honour of the victory, which he held undoubtedly his owne; and the ries there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and there is and the nor seen the enemy, than bin vanquished by him. Therefore the attended the Carthaginist over the Armie, and the Friends that hee had at home bearing office in Rome, were ner seen the enemy, than bin vanquissed by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian of the Armie, and the friends that hee had at home bearing office in Rome, were so neer, as he kept him from stragling too far; & preserved the countrie from utter spoils hought to save him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter never so haily. Hannibal on the other side was no lesse glad, that he should play with a more adand he brought them first to looke on the Lyon afarre off, that in the end he might store sames gamester. Therefore he drew neer, & to provoke the Romans, sent forth athird his taile.

Now Minutius had a contrary disposition, and was as fiery as Flaminius; taxing Fahim with cowardize and feare. But all stirred not this well-advised Commander. For wife men are no more moved with fuch noise, than with winde bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indifcretion and danger, than to purfue misfortune: it wasteth itselfe sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the invading Army that defires battell: and this of Hannibal, was both the invading and victorious. Fabius therefore suffred Hannibal to crosse the Appenines, and to fall upon the most rich and pleasant Territone of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perswaded, to adventure the Roman Armie in battell: but being far too weake in horse, he alwayes kept the Hils and of faff grounds. When Hannibal faw he could by no meanes drawthis wary Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on, and that the Towns stood firm for the Romans, whose Legions were in fight, though afarre off; he refolved to rest his Army, that was loaden with spoyle, in some plentifull and assured place, till the following spring. But ere this can bedone, he must passe along by the Dictators campe, that hung over his head upon the hils of Callicula, and Casilinum: for other way there was none, by which he might iffue out of that goodly garden-countrie, which he had already wasted, into places more abundant of provision for his wintering. It was by meere errour of his guide, that he first enged within these streights. For he would have bin directed unto Casinum, whence he might both affay the faire Citie of Capua, which had made him friendly promifes under whand, and hinder the Romans from comming neere it to prevent him. But his guide mifindentiood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awry another way, from Casimum to Casilinum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now began the wisedome of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in arrap, and won the victory without blowes. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himselfe, by a sleight invention, yet serving the turne as well as a better. In driving hecountry, he had gotten about two thousand Kine, whose hornes he dressed with dry figgors, and fetting fire to them in the darke night, caused them to be driven up the hils. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those that knew it to be aworke of a terrible enemy. What it should meane, Fabius could not tell; but thought it ndevice to circumvent him, and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the bill-tops were horribly afraid, when some of these fiery Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore hastily away, thinking that the enemies were behind their backs; adfell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no leffe afraid of them. So Hanmal, with his whole Army, recovered fure ground without molestation: where he staid and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the hmans, that began to hold them in skirmish. After this, Hannibal made semblance of tking his journy towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted maner; keemgstill on high grounds, betweene him and the Citie, whilest the Carthaginian wasted Athe Plaines. The Carthaginian tooke Geryon, an old ruinous Town in Apulia, for saken with Inhabitants, which hee turned into Barnes and Store-houses for winter, ad incamped under the broken wall. Other matter of importance hee did none: but the time passed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some uneffe of Religion, and left the Armie in charge with Minutius the Master of the Minuting was glad of this good occasion to shew his owne sufficiency. He was fully Missaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans and Spanirds: by whom if they had beene foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open face, but by fubtilty and ambush, which he thought himselfe wise enough to prevent. All the Armie was of his opinion; and that so carnestly, as he was preferred, by judgemut of the Souldiers, in worthinesse to command, before the cold and warie Fabius. In this jollity of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had he beene peremptorily forCHAP 3. S. G.

part of his Armie to waste the Countrie. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it seemes, that he now despised those whom he had so often vanquished. There was a piece of high ground between the two Campes; which be vanquished it would be commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians seized upcause it would be commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians seized upon by night with two thousand of their light-armed. But Minutius, by plain force, wan it from them the next day; and intrenching himselfe thereupon; became their neerer

The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not only for his men, but for his horses, which he knew to be the chiefe of his strength; that hee might keepe them in good heart against the next Summer: if besides this he could give to the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, incourage his owne men, terrefie his enemies, and give him leave to forrage the Country at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes issue forth of his Campe, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in harvest. This advantage Minutius wisely espied, and tooke. For he led forth his Armie, and setting it in order, presented battell to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, even at his owne Trenches. His horses, and all his light Armature, divided into many companies, he fent abroad against the forragers; who being differfed over all the fields, and loaden with bootie, could make no resistance. This angred Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worse didit anger him, when the Romans took heart to affaile his Trenches. They perceived that 20 it was meere weakenesse, which held him within his Campe, and therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the businesse, Asarubal came from Geryon with foure thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This imboldned Hannibal to iffue forth against the Romans; to whom neverthelesse he did not such hurt, as he had recei-

For this piece of service Minutius was highly esteemed by the Armie, and more highly by the people at Rome, to whom he fent the newes, with somewhat greater boast thantruth. It feemed no small matter, that the Roman Armic had recovered spirit, so farre forth that it dared to fet upon Hannibal in his own camp; and that in fo doing, it came off 30 with the better. Every man therefore praised the Master of the horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and confequently, they grew as far out of liking with Fabin, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wifely, in all his Dictatorship: faving that he chose such a worthy Lievtenant; whereas indeed in no other thing he had fo greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so joyfull of a little good lucke, as angry with the breach of discipline; and fearefull of greater danger, thereon likely to enfue. He said that he knew his owne place, and what was to bedone; that he would teach the Master of the horse to doe so likewise; and make him give account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: fpeaking it openly, That good fuccesse, issuing from bad counsell, was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish 40 confidence, the other taught men to be warie. Against these sermons every one cried out, especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to speake, and doe what he lift, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (faid hee) that this our onely Man, chosen to be Generall, and Lord of the Towne, in our greatest necessitie, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italie to be wasted before his eyes, to the utter shame of our State; unlesse healso hinder others, from doing better than himfelfe can, or dares : It were good to confider what he meanes by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not chosen any new Confull all this while; Servilius is sent away to Sea, I know not why : Hannibal andhe, have as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeed forborne to spoyle some grounds of se Fabius, that so he might bring him into envie and suspition) and the Dictator giving him leave to spoyle all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is even this: he would have the war to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and have the sole Government both of our Citie and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonalty of Rome, which gave him this authority, should againe take it from him, and conferre it upon one more worthy. But left, in moving the people hereto, I should seeme to doe him injurie; thus farre forth I will regard his honour: I will onely propound, That the Master of the Horse may be joyned in equal authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor lesse necessary, than was the election of this Diagram, by the People.

Though all men, even the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabita had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the prefent; yet was there none so injurious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publique, was lesse than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the maner in naffing of any act, that some man of credit and authority, besides the propounder, should fland up, and formally deliver his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was to found fo impudent, as to offer that open difgrace, bothunto a worthy Personage, and (therewithall) unto that dignity, whose great power had freed the State at several times, from the greatest dangers. Onely C. Terenius Varro, who the yeere before had heene Prætor, was glad of fuch an opportunity, to winnethe favour of the Multitude. This fellow was the some of a Butcher, afterwards became a Shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew, by often brabbling, to take upon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees. being advanced by those, who in harred of the Nobility favoured his very basenesse. And now he thought the time was come, for him to give a hard push at the Consulfing: by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or favouring one another, either durft or would. So he made an hot invective, not only against Fabrus, but against all the Nobility; faying, That it grieved them to fee the people doe well, and take upon them what belonged unto them, in matter of Government; That they fought to humble the Commons by povertie, and to impoverish them by Warre; especially by warre at their owne doores, which would foone confume every poore mans living. and finde him other worke to thinke upon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wife; and fince they had found one (this worthy Master of the Horse) that was better affected unto them and his Countrey, to reward him according to his good deferts; and give him authority, according as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled to proceed as hee had begun. So the Act . paffed.

Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Confull which was M. Airlim Regulm, in the roome of C. Flaminius: and, having finished all requifite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiving well, that he should not be able towithstand the multitude, in hindering the decree. The newes of Minutius his advance. ment, was at the campe as soone as Fabius: so that his old Lievtenant, and new Colleague, began to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what forthee thought it best to divide their authority: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them successively, for some longer time, should command in chiefe. Fabins briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equall to the Dictator, but that he should never be his superiour: Hee would therefore divide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the custome. Minutial was not herewith greatly pleased; for that with halfeof the Armie he could not worke such wonders as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Neverthelesse he meant to doe his best, and so taking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and a halfe from the Dictator. Needfull it was (though Livie seemes to taxe him for it) that he should so doe For where two feverall Commanders are not subordinate one unto another, nor joyned in Commission, but have each intire and absolute charge of his owne followers, there are the forces (though belonging to one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in which regard, one Campe shall not hold them both, without great inconvenience. Polybius neither findes fault with this distinction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was unwilling to command in chiefe fuccessively (as the two Consuls used) with Minutius. by turnes. He faith that Minutus was very refractary; and so proud of his advancement, that continually he opposed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choyce, either to divide the forces between them, as is faid before, or else to have command over all by course. This is likely to be true. For Natures impatient of subjection, when once they have broken loofe from the rigour of authority, love nothing more, than to contest with it: as if herein confisted the proofe and assurance of their libertie.

It behoved the Master of the horse, to make good the opinion which had thus advanced him. Therefore he was no leffe carefull of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabins of avoiding the necessity. That which Minutine and Hannibal equally defired, could not long be wanting. The country lying between them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adjoyning had many & spacious caves; able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places Hannibal bestowed five hundred horse, and five thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discovered. But lest by any misadventure they should be found out, and buried in their holes; he made offer betimes in the morning, to feize upon a piece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and to the thoughts of the Romans, from their more needfull care, to bufineffe little concerning them. Like unto this was the occasion, which not long before had provoked Minutius to adventure upon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like fort as he got it; he fent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hanmibal seconded his owne troupes with fresh companies) he followed in person with the Legions. He was foon caught, and fo horly charged on all fides, that he knew neither how to make refistance, nor any fafe retrait. In this dangerous case, whilest the Romans defended themselves, losing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew neer, in very good order, to relieve them. For this old Captain, perceiving afar off, into what extremity his new Colleague had rashly throwne himselfe and his followers, did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Country, than the difgrace which he had wrongfully fultained, lought rather to approve himselfe by hasting to doe good, than by fuffering his enemy to feele the reward of doing ill, Upon Fabius his approach, Hannibal retired: fearing to be well wetted with a showr, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung fo long on the Hill-tops. Minuting forthwith submitted himselfe to Fabius; by whose benefit he confessed his life to have bin saved. So from this time forwards the war proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would have it; both whilest his Office lasted, which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he delivered up his charge unto the Confuls, that followed his instructions.

Servilius the Conful had purfued in vaine a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came never within kenning. He ran along all the coast of Italie; tooke hostages of the Sardinians and Corficans; passed over into Africk; and there negligently falling to spoyle the country, was shamefully beaten aboord his ships, with the lose of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all hafte, he returned home by Sicil; and (being fo required by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Conful, where they took charge of the Armie.

4. VII.

The Roman people, defirous to finish the warre quickly, choose a rash and unworthy Consul. Great forces levied against Hannibal . Hannibal taketh the Romans provisions in the Castle of Canna. The new Consuls fet forth against Hannibal.

Ith little pleasure did they of the poorer fort in Rome heare the great commendations that were given to Fabius by the principall Citizens. He had indeed preserved them from receiving a great overthrow; but he had neither finished the war, nor done any thing in appearance thereto tending. Rather it might feeme, that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the flow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worle) of those that followed him, in protracting the worke to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrary to all former custome; fince it was never heard before, that any Roman Generall had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without amy performance: as if it were honourable to doe just nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were ready every man to discharge the griese and anger of his own private losse, upon the ill administration of the publike.

This affection of the people, was very helpfull to C. Terentius Varre, in his fuit for the Confulship. It behaved him to strike, whilest the Iron was hot : his owne worth being little or none, and his credit over-weake, to make way into that high Dignity. But the

Comminaltie were then in fuch a mood, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Whereinto helpe, he had a kinfman, Bibim Herennim, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to use the liberty of his place, in saying what he listed, without all regard of truth, or modestie. This bold Orator stucke not to affirme, that Hannibal was drawne into Italie, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; That Minuim indeed with his two Legions, was likely to have beene overthrowne, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but, had all been joyned together, what they might have done, it was apparent, by the victorie of Minuitus, when he commanded over all as Mafter of the horse; That without a Plebeian Confull, the warre would never bee brought to an end; That fuch of the Plebeians as had long fince beene advanced to honour by the people, were growne as proud as the old Nobilitie, and contemned the meaner fort, ever fince themselves were freed from contempt of the more mightie; That therefore it was needfull to choose a Conful, who should be altogether a Pleberan, ameere new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples love, nor could wish more, than to keepe it, by well deferving of them. By fuch perswasions the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Terenium: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could mtendure to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his detracting from their homur; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fell out, or at least was alledged, that neither of the two present Confuls would well be spared from attending upon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore aDictator was named for that purpole; and hee againe deposed: either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to prevaile in choice of the new Confuls. This Interignum tooke name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in use at the dath of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the fift were an hundred, parted themselves into Tens, or Decuries; and governed successiveh, by the space of five dayes, one Decurre after another in order : yet so, that the Littors, or Virgers, carrying the Falces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited onely upon the chiefe of them with these Ensignes of power. This custome was retained in times of the Conhis; and put in use, when by death, or any casualty, there wanted ordinary Magistrates ofthe old yeare, to substitute new for the yeare following. The advantage of the Fahersherein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would have it, there and then was all to begin anew: by which inemption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well affwaged. Upon fuch change ofthose, that were Presidents of the election; it was also lawfull unto new Petitioners, whe for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time linited, wherein they should publikely declare themselves to seeke those offices. But no wice would serve against the generall favour borne unto Terenius. One Inter-regnum pled over, and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was believed) of this mane, but worthy man, seemed so manifest, that when the People had urged the buffwhere dispatch, onely Terentius was chosen Consult: in whose hand it was lest, to hold helection of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gave over For whermen of ordinary marke had stood for the place before, it was now thought meet, that, wh to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this unexpert, and hot-headed n, one of great fufficiencie, and reputation, should be joyned with him, as both Commion and opposite. So L. Æmilim Paulm, he who few yeares since had overcome the lyians, and chased Demerrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was urged by the Nobility hand for the place; which he eafily obtained, having no Competitor. It was not the the of this honourable man, to trouble himselse any more in such great businesse of the Common-wealth. For, notwithstanding his late good service, He, and M. Livins that had the his companion in Office, were afterwards injuriously vexed by the People, and and unto judgement: wherein Livius was condemned, and Amilius hardly escaped. tof this injustice they shall put the Romans well in minde each of them in his second Conful thip, wherein they shall honourably approve their worth; the one of them nobly in the most grievous losse; the other bravely winning, in the most happy victoric atever befell that Common-wealth. These new Confuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence in preparing the warre: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders

he would worke, and that he would aske no more, than once to have a fight of Hannibal, whom he promifed to vanquish the very first day: yet the providence and care of Pan-In travelled more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boasted. He wrote unto the two old Confuls Servilius and Arilius, desiring them to abstaine from hazzard of the maine chance; but neverthelesse, to plie the Carthagmians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when hee and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Armie which they were now levying, they might finde the foure old Legions well accustomed to the enemie, and the enemie well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate affifted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the flanders, with which to Terentius and his Adherents had burdened them. What number of menthey raised, it is uncertaine. Fourescore thousand foot, at the least, and fixe thousand horse, they were ftrong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly defired, of looking upon Hannibal.

Hiero, the old King of Syracufe, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their owne Mercenaries; so did he now send help to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantitie of Wheat, Barlie, and other provisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mightie Cities should destroy the other, whereby his owne estate would fall to ruine, that stood upright, by having them somewhat evenly ballanced. He gave them also counsell, to send forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that meanes they might divert the warre from home. His gifts, and good advice were lovingly accepted; and instructions were given to Titus Offacilius the Prator, which was to goe into Sicil, that he should accordingly passe over into Africke, if hee

The great Levies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more serveto declare their puissance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of such as were not easily drawne into the field, and fitted for service. For, besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicil, twentie five thousand, with L. Posthumius Albinus, another of the Prætors, went against the Gaules, to reclaime that Province, which the pasfage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their prefent strength, might well embolden them to doe as they did. They fent Embassadors to Philip, the son of Demerrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliver into their hands Demetraus Pharius: who, having been their subject, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdome. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already past. What answer they received, it is not knowne: only this is known, that Demetrius Pharius was not fent unto them; and that Philip henceforth began to have an eyeupon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian money, by the shifts that they were driven soon after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little soever) would have bin welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cavill about forfeiture for non-paiment of the whole.

Whilst the Citie was bussed in these cares, the old Consuls lay as neere unto Hanni bal as possibly they could, without incurring the necessity of a battell. Many skir milhes they had with him wherein their successe, for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not onely blemished the honour of their other services, but was indeed the occasion to draw on the miserie following. Hannibal, for the most pare of that time, made his abode at Geryon; where lay all his store for the Winter. The Ro mans, to be neere him, lodged about Cannusium; and, that they might not be driven to turne afide for all necessaries, to the losse of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Castle of Canna: for the towne was razed the yeere before. This place Hannibal wan, and thereby not onely furnished himselfe, but compelled his ene miesto want many needfull things, unlesse they would be troubled with farre carriage Besides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himselfe to abide in that open Coun trie, fit for the service of his horse, longer than the Romans, having so many mouth to feed, could well endure to tarry; without offering battell, which hee most defired Of this mishap when Servilius had informed the Senate, letting them understand, ho this Peece, taken by Hannibal, would ferve him to command no small part of the Cou of Italy. Nevertheleffe, answer was returned unto Servilius, that he should have patience yet awhile: for that the Confuls would shortly be there, with a power sufficient to doe as need required.

When all things were ready in the City, and the season of the yeere commodious to take the field, the two Confuls, with their Army, fet forth against Hannibal. This was alwaies done with great folemnity : especially, when soever they went forth to warre against any noble or redoubted Enemy . For Sacrifices, and solemne Vowes, were made unto Jupiter, and the rest of their gods, for good successe and victory: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honorable traine of the principall men, (not onely fuch as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Voluntaries, for love, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanied on their way, and dismissed with friendly leave-taking, and good wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited upon Emilius Paulus, as the onely Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honour, or likely to doe his countrie remarkeable fervice. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troupe no leffe in greatnesse, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is faid to have exhorted the Confull Paulus, with many grave words, to shew his magnanimity, not onely in dealing with the Cathaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outragious follie of his fellow-Confull. The answer of Paulin, was, That he meant not againe to runne into danger of condemnation by offending the multitude; that he would doe his best for his Countrie: but if he faw his best were likely to be ill taken, he would thinke it lesse rashnesse to adventure upon the Enemies fword, than upon the malice of his owne Citizens.

6. VIII.

Diffention betweene the two Roman Consuls. Whether it be likely, that Hannibal was upon point of flying out of Italy, when the Romans pressed him to fight. The great battaile of Canna.

Hele new Generals, arriving at the Campe, dismissed M. Atilius, one of the last yeeres Confuls, requesting it because of his age and weaknesse: Servilius they retained with them, as their Affistant. The first thing that Emilius thought necessary, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad successe hiherto, had gathered more cause of seare, than of courage. He willed them to consider, not onely now, their victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their owne great numbers: which were no leffe than all that Rome at the prefent was able to fet forth. Hee told dem in what danger their Country stood; how the state and safety thereof rested upon their hands; using some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectuall part of his Oration, was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, bad not yet obtained one victory by plaine force and valour: but that onely by deceit and ambushhe had stolne the honor, which he had gotten at Trebia & Thrasymene. Herewithall he taxed the inconfiderate rashnesse of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one law not his enemies, untill hee was furrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head, by reason of the thick mist, through the darknesse whereofhe went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their fnares. Finally, declaring what advantages they had against the Enemie; and how destitute the Enemie was of those helpes, by which he had hitherto prevailed against them; he exhorted them to play the and doetheir best. They were easily perswaded: for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of Armes, gave them saufe to thinke, that under a Captaine so well experienced, and every way sufficient, Emilius was knowne to bee, they should easily prevaile against the Carthaginians, hat came short of them in all things else, save craft; which would not alwayes thrive. But in one thing they mistooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his defire that tey should have heart to fight; not that they should lose the patience of awaiting a this Peece, taken by Hannibal, would lerve nim to command no main part that they should lose the patience of awaiting a trie adjacent; it then seemed needfull, even unto the Fathers themselves, to advenue the safety for the strength of the safety for the safety trie adjacent; it then seemed needfull, even unto the Fathers the inches to bee battell with the Carthaginian, rather than suffer him thus to take roote in the grown impediments: and thereby sought to robbe themselves of their best helpe; which was , good conduct. They remembred what talke they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected with the vulgar defire, of ending the warre quickly; wherein fince Emilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them forbeare to use it? Thus thought the common Souldier : and thus also thought the Confull Terenting 5 who was no leffe popular in the Campe, than hee had beene in the City. Expectation is alwayes tedious; and never more, than when the Event is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Army, to bee freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Feare: therefore Terenius, who hastened their defireto effect, was likely to win more thankes, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans thinke themselves to have the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconvenience, than which few are more dangerous; Diffension of their chiefe Commanders . Varro would fight: Emilius would fo too, but faid that it was not yet time; why: because the enemy must shortly dislodge, and remove hence, into places lesse fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having eatenuphis last yeeres provisions, returne into Campania to gather a second Harvest . This would (faid Varro) favour too much of 2. Fabius: And your haste (faid Paulus) doth favour no lesse of C. Flaminius. Their deeds were like their words: for they commanded by turnes interchangeably every day. Emilius lodged fixe miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat uneven. Thither if the Carthaginians would take paines to 20 come; hee doubted not to fend them away in such haste, as they should not leave running till they were out of Italy. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plaines; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Nevertheleffe he sate down close by Hannibal: who, as an unbidden guest, gave him but a rude wel-come and entertainment. The Carthaginian Horse, and light armature, sell upon the Roman Vant-courrers; and put the whole Army in tumult, whileft it was yet in march : but they were beaten off, not without losse, for that the Romans had among their Velites, some troupes weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Amilius, who could not handsomely withdraw the Army out of that levell ground, incamped upon the River Aufidus; fending a third part of his forces over 3 the water, to lye upon the Easterne banke, where they entrenched themselves. Hee never was more unwilling to fight, than at this present: because the ground served wholly for the advantage of his enemie; with whom he meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equall termes. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himselfe; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remove towards Geryon, Canna, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necessaries: whereof an Army forraging the Countrie, was not likely to carry about with it sufficient quantity, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed over with silence, That Livie differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strangetales, of the misery into which Hannibal had a beene driven; and of base courses that he devised to take, if the Romans could have retained their patience a little longer. Hee had (faith Livie) but tenne dayes provision of meat. He had not money to pay his Souldiers. They were an unruly Rabble, gathered out of severall Nations, so that he knew not how to keepe them in order ; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Provant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were ready to for sake him, and runne over to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himselfe was once upon the point, to have stolne away into Gaule with all his horse, and lest his foot unto their miserable destinies. At length for lack of all other counfaile, he refolved to get him as farre as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his unfaithfull Soul-5 diers might finde the more difficulty in running from him; and that his hunger might bee relieved with the more early harvest. But whilest he was about to put this device in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they even forced him to that, which hee most desired, even to fight a battaile upon open Champaine ground: wherein hee was victorious. It was not uncommendable in Livie, to speake the best of his owner Citizens; and, where they did ill, to fay, That, without their owne great folly, they had done passing well. Further also hee may be excused; as writing onely by report. For thus he faith, Hannibal de fuga in Galliam (dicitur) agitaffe; Hannibal (is faid) 10 have bethought himselfe of flying into Gaule : where he makes it no more than a matter of heare-fay; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the processe it selfe, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal comming out of Gaule, through the Marifhes and Boos of Herruria, could finde victualls enough, and all things needfull unto his Army, the Summer foregoing: what should hinder him to doe the like this yeere; especially seeing he had plaid the carefull husband in making a great harveft; fince he had long beene Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surprise, no small part of the Romans provisions: Suteable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but come and cattell, his Souldiers might perhaps have fallen into mutinie for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italie and had fo well increased his stocke, since he came into that Countrie, that he had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like, and loaden his followers with spoile: having left wherewith to redeeme as many of his owne, as were taken by the Enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not easie to doe the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the generall agreement of Historians: who give it as a principall commendation unto Hannibal, That he alwayes kept his Army free from fedition, though it were composed of fundry Nations; no leffe different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might hee fo doe, having not onely pronounced. That which of his men foever fought hravely with an Enemy, was thereby a Carthaginian; but folemnly protested and swore. (befides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should deferve and feeke it free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaule, was a fenfeleffe device. Hannibal, being there with his whole Army tooke so little pleasure in the Countrie and People, that hemade all haste to get him out of it. And what should he now do there with his horse or how could he be trusted, either there or elsewhere : yea, how could he defire to live ; having betrayed all his Army, and relinquished his miserable foot, to the butcherie of their enemies: This tale therefore Plutarch omitteth; who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a maner all his directions from Livie. But of this and the like it is enough to fav. That all Historians love to extoll their own Conntri-men; and where a losse cannot bediffembled, nor the honour of the victory taken from the Enemy, & given unto blinde Fortune, there to lay all the blame on some strange misgovernment of their own forces: as if they might eafily have won all, but loft all through fuch folly, as no Enemy can hope to finde in them another time.

Now let us returne backe to the two Armies, where they lye encamped on the River Aufidus, Varro was perfwaded, that it concerned him in honour, to make good his word unto the people of Rome: and fince he had thus long waited in vaine, to get the confent of Paulus, now at length to use his owne authority; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his owne day came. When therefore it was his turne to command at the first breake of the day he began to passe the River, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and fought, as in former times, to have diffwaded him, from putting the estate of his Countrie to a needlesse hazzard. Against whose words and substantiall arguments, Terentius could alledge none other, than point of Honour. Hannibal had presented them battaile at their Trenches: should they endure this Bravado: He had sent his Numidians over the River but even the day before, who fell upon the Romans that were fetching water to the leffer Campe: and drave them shamefully to runne within their defences, which also they made offer to affaile: must this also be suffered : Hee would not endure it : for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was lively, and full of such courage, as promifed affured victory. When Amilius perceived, that he could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion, heetooke all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Ten thousand Roman foot he caused to be left behinde, in the greater campe opposite unto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled to leave behinde him some answerable number, for desence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucitie he was lesse able to spare from the battaile, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling upon the Carthaginian Campe, when the fight began, & taking it with all the wealth therin, might therby (as commonly doe such accidents) terrefie and distract the Enemies in the heate of fight. This done, the two Confuls went over the water with their Armie to the leffer Campe, whence allo they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battaile : the ground on the East part of the River, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Army. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and without any delay, passed likewise over formewhat higher up the streame, which ran from the South; leaving in his owne campe fo many, as he thought would ferve to defend it, and no more. To encourage hismen; He bad them looke about them, and view the ground well, upon which they were to fight. They did fo. And could you (faid hee) pray for any greater fortune than to joyne battaile with the Romans upon fuch a levell ground, where the stronger in horse are sure to prevaile? They all affented to him; and shewed by their countenances , that they were very glad of it. Well then (faid heefurther) yee are first of all to thanke the gods, that have brought them hither; and then Us, that have trained them in along, and drawne them into necessity of playing for their lives, where they are sure to lose them. As for these Romans, I was faine to encourage you against them, when yee met them first: but now yee may even encourage your selves, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom yee have as often beaten as seene. Of one thing onely I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects, 35, to drive them before you out of Gaule; and to win the open Countrie, and fields of Italy; both of which yee have obtained: now are ye to fight for the Townes themselves, and all the riches within them; which this victory shall make yours. Therefore play the ftout Souldiers: and ere many houres passe, yee shall be Lords of all that the Romans

When he had faid this; his brother Mago came to him, whom he had fent to view the countenance of the Enemy. Hannibal asked him, what newes; & what worke they were likely to have with these Romans ? Work enough (answered Mago) for they are an hortible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replyed) I tell thee, brother, that among them all, fearch them never fo diligently, thou shalt not finde one man, whose name is Mago. With that he fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladded the fouldiers, who thought their Generall would not be fo merry, without great affurance. Whether it were fosthat Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago above many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no leffe troubled with thinking upon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether hee meant onely to correct the fad moode of his brother with a jeft, and shew himselfe merry unto the Souldiers: this his answer was more manly, than was the relation of his discoverer. But if Hannibalhimfelse had beene sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans, he could not have returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captain Gam, before the battalle of Agincourt, made unto our King Henry the fift: faying, that of the Frenchmen, there were enow to be killed; enow to be taken prisoners; and enow to run away. Even such words as these, or such pleasant jests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but ferve many times, when battaile is at hand, to worke upon fuch paffions, as must governe more of the businesse: especially, where other needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boafts.

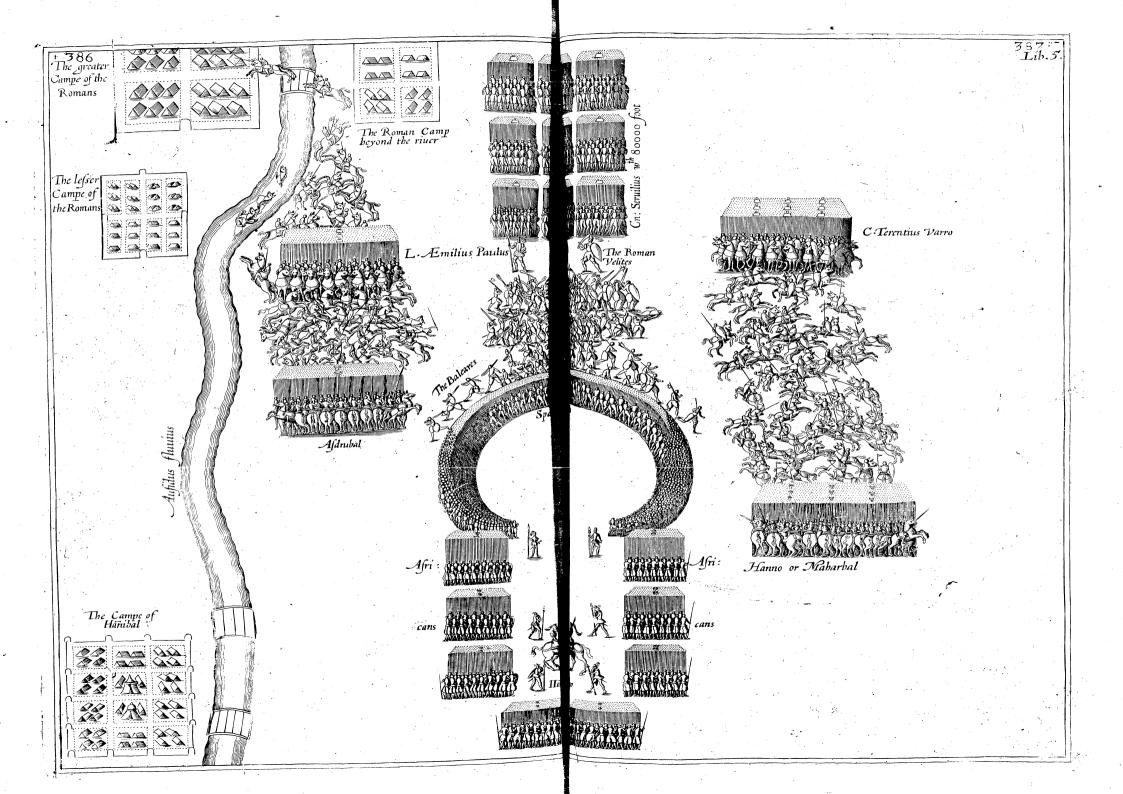

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselfe; expressing no lesse perfection of his military skill, than was greatnesse in his spirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiousnesse of the place, into which he had long before conceived the meanes to draw his enemies to battaile; He marshalled his Army in such convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where every one might doe best service. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, hee fent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velices. These were loose troupes, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Enfans perdues; but when we used our owne termes, the forlorne hope. The groffe of his Army following them, he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman maner, with the spoiles which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the use of those weapons, that were of more advantage, than those where with they had formerly served; made the two wings, very deepe in File. Betweene these he ranged his Gaules and Spaniards, armed, each after their own Countrey manner; their shields alike; but the Gaules using long broad swords, that were forcible in a downe-right stroake; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gaules, naked from their navell upwards, as confidenting their own fiercenesse: the Spaniards, wearing white cassocks embroidered with purple.

This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furnitute, as in quality, made a gallant shew; and terrible, because strange. The Gaules were strong of body, and furious in giving charge, but soone wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them have inherited to this day. The Spamards were leffe eager, but more warie; neither ashamed to give ground, when they were over-pressed; nor afraid to returne, & renew the fight, upon any small encouragement. As the roughnesse of the one, and patience of the other, served mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firme temper; fo the place which they held in this battaile, added confidence joyntly into them both. For they faw themselves well and frongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was growne terrible in Spaine, by their Conquests; and in Gaule, by this their present war. Since therefore it could not be feared, that any great calamity should fall upon them, whilest the wings on either fide flood faft: the fe Barbarians had no cause to shrinke, or forbeare to imploy the uttermost of their hardinesse, as knowing that the enemy could not presse farre upon them, without further engaging himselfe than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great advantage, which the Carthaginian had in horse: by which he was able, if the world had happened, to make a good retrait. The effect of contraries ismany times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so lively, as doth affured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gaules and Spaniards to adovance; leaving voide the place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall backe, when they should be overhardly pressed. So, casting them into the forme of a Crescent, He made them as it were his Vant-guard : the two points of this great halfe Moone, that looked toward the empty space from which he had drawne it, being narrow and thin, as serving onely to guide it orderly backe, when need should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthened & thickned against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to have beene so great, that it fladowed the Africans, who flood behinde it: though fuch figures, cut in braffe, as I have sene of this Battaile, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appeare: asalfo in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were pleft in the Reare, to second the Gaules and Spaniards, when they were driven to tetrait; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood between the last rankes of his long battalions, and in the head of his Reare, doubtleffe well accompanied with the choice of his owne Nation. Betweene the left battalion and the River Aufidus, were the Gaules & Spanish horse, under the command of Asdrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plaines was Hanno (Livie faith Maharbal) with the Numidian light-horse. Hannibal hinselfe, with his brother Mago, had the leading of the Reare. The whole summe of Hannibals Army in the field this day, was ten thousand horse, and forty thousand foot; his enemies having two to one against him in foot; and He, five to three against them in

The Roman Army was marshalled in the usuall forme: but somewhat more narrow, and deepe, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had beene found convenient against the Carthaginians, in the former warre. It was indeed no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks thack and short, but the Files long; as also to strengthen well the Reare, that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, under shelter whereof the disordered troupes might re-ally themselves. Thus much it seemes, that Terentius had learned of fome old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battailes accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his understanding. But the Carthagnians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their advantage was in Horse; against which, this manner of embattailing was very unprofitable, for a since as their charge is better fustained in front, than upon a long flanke. As for Amilius, it was not his day of command: He was but an Affistant; and in such cases it happens often, that wise men yeeld for very wearinesse unto the more contentious. Upon the right hand, and toward the River, were the Roman horse-men, under the Consult Panlus: On the left wing, Was C. Terentin Varro the other Confull, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Latines, and other affociates: Cn. Servilius the former yeeres Confull, had the leading of thebattaile. The Sunne was newly risen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians having their faces Northward, the Romans toward the South.

flingers of the Baleares: Astrubal brake upon the Confull Paulus, and was roughly encountred; not after the manner of fervice on horfe-backe, used in those times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giving on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron, as having the River on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; so that there was no way left, but to pierce and breake thorow. Wherefore they not onely used their Lances and Swords; but rushing violently amongst the Enemies, grasped one another: and so their horses running from under them, fell many to the gound; where starting up againe, they began to deale blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were over-borne, and driven by plaine force to staggering recoile. This the Confull Paulus could not remedy. For Asdrubal, with his boisterous Gaules and Spaniards, was not to be refisted by these Roman Gentlemen, unequall both in number, and in horsmanship. When the battailes came to joyning, the Roman Legionaries found worke enough, and fomewhat more than enough, to breake that great Crescent, upon which they first fell: fo strongly for the while, did the Gaules and Spanish foot make refistance. Wherefore the two points of their battaile drew towards the midst; by whose aide, these Oppofites were forced to disband, and flye backe to their first place. This they did in great hafte and feare : and were with no leffe hafte, and folly purfued. Upon the Africans that stood behinde them, they needed not to fall foule; both for that there was voide roome enough; and forafmuch as the Reare, or Hornes of this Moone, pointed into the fafe retrait, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-enforce them, 2 when time should require. In this hasty retrait, or slight, of the Gaules and Spaniards; it hapned, as was necessary, that they who had stood in the limbe or utter compasse of the halfe Moone, made the innermost or concave surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turne the infide outward: the hornes or points thereof, as yet, untouched, onely turning round, & recoyling very little. So the Romans. in purfuing them, were inclosed in an halfe circle; which they should not have needed greatly to regard, (for that the fides of it were exceeding thin and broken; and the bottome of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and feeming unable to makerefistance) had all the enemies foot bin cast into this one great body, that was in a manner diffolyed. But whilest the Legions, following their supposed victory, rushed on upon those that stood before them, & thereby unwittingly engaged themselves deeply within the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either fide advanced fo far, that getting beyond the Reare of them, they enclosed them, in a manner, behinde: and forward they could not passe farre, without removing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least easie. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as covered the Africans, who lay behinde it undifferned, untill now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled unawares; and that they behaved themselves, as menthat thought upon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gaules. Neither is it credible, that they would have beene fo mad, as to run head-long, with the whole bulke of their Army, into the throat of flaughter; had they seene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashnesse of inferiour Captaines: but since the Confull Paulus, a man so expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot be supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Asdrubal, having broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Confull Paulus, followed upon them along the River fide, beating downe and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consull himselfe was either driven upon his owne Legions, or will lingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, not withstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Neverthe leffe he cheared up his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his owne from behaviour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the fame part of the battaile; and with better successes. For the Consul received a blow from a fling, that did him great hurt: and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to save him from further harme; yet was he so hardly laid at, the he was compelled, by wounds and weaknesse, to forsake his horse. Hereupon all his company alighted, thinking that the Confull had given order fo to doe: as in many battailes, the Roman men at armes had left their horses, to help their foot in distress. When Hannibal (for he was neer at hand) perceived this, and understood that the Consull had willed his horfe-men to difmount; He was very glad of it, and pleafantly faid, I had rather he would have delivered them unto me, bound hand & foot: meaning, that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of his affociates, in the left wing, was marvellously troubled by Hanno (or Maharbal) and the Numidians: who beating up and downe about that great fandy Plaine, raifed a foule dust; which a strong Southwinde, blowing there accustomarily, drave into the eyes and mouthes of the Romans. These using their advantage both of number and of lightnesse, wearied the Confull and his followers exceedingly: neither giving: nor fustaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him an happy day of it. For when the battailes were even ready to joyne; five hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellowes, with their shields cast behinde their backes, (as was the maner of those which yeelded) and, throwing downe their armes, rendred themselves. This was good lucke wbeginne withall, if there had beene good meaning. Varro had not leisure to examine them; but caused them, unweaponed as they were, to get them behinde the Armie, where he bade them rest quietly till all was done. These crafty adventurers did as hee bade them, for a while; till they found opportunity to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yeelded. Under their Jackets they had short swords and poniards: besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field of such as were slain. and therewithall flew upon the hindmost of the Romans, whilest all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: fo that they did great mischiefe, and raised yet a greater terror. Thus Hannibal, in a plaine levell ground, found meanes to lay an ambush at the backe of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight and refistance, was given by the same hand which gave the first. Astrubal, having in short space broken the Romane troups of horse, and cut in pieces all, save the Companie of Amilius that rushed into the groffe of his foot, and a very few befides, that recovered fome narrow paffage, between the River and their owne Battalions; did not ftay to charge upon the face of the Legions, but fell backe behinde the Reare of his owne, and fetching about, came up to the Numidians: with whom he joyned, and gave upon Terentius.

This fearefull cloud, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behinde it, on the other fide: so did it prognosticate a dismall storme unto those upon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, having wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more worke toward, than they could hope to fuffaine; thought it the best way, to avoid the danger by present slight. The Consult was no leffe wife than they, in apprehending the greatnesse of his owne perill; nor more desperate, in striving to worke impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many shranke from him, to fustaine the impression alone, which he could not have indured with their affiltance. Now hee found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to incounter him. But of this or of ought elfe, excepting hafty flight, his prefint leifure would not ferve him to confider. Close at the heeles of him and his flying troupes, followed the light Numidians, appointed by Asdrubal unto the pursuit, as fittest for that fervice. Aldrubal himselfe, with the Gaules and Spanish horse, compasing about, fell upon the backes of the Romans; that were ere this hardly distressed, and in a manner furrounded on all parts else: He brake them easily; who before made Ill refiftance, being inclosed, and laid at on every fide, not knowing which way to turne. Here began a pittifull flaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging up and downe, they knew not whither or which way, whileft every one fought to avoid those enemies, whom he faw neerest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Emilius, got up to horse, and saved themselves: which though it is hardly understood how they could do; yet I will rather beleeve it, than suppose that Livie so reporteth, to grace therby his History with this following tale. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place where he saw the Consull sitting all bloudied upon a stone, intreated him to rise and save bimselfe; offering him his assistance and horse. But Paulus refused it; willing Lenculus to shift for hamselfe, and not to lose time: saying, That it was not his purpose to be brought againe into judgement by the People either as an accuser of his Colleague, or as guilty himfelfe of that dayes loffe. Further, he willed Lentulus to commend bim to the Senate, and in particular to Fabius: willing them to fortifie Rome, as fast as well they could; and telling Fabius, that he lived and died mindfull of his wholesome counsaile. These words (perad. venture) or some to like purpose, the Consul uttered to Lentulus, either when against his will he was drawne to that Battaile, or when he beheld the first defeat of his Horse; at what time he put himselfe in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannih al. knew what he faid a good while before this; when he thought the Confull & his troupe. in little better case than if they had been bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans, was inclosed indeed as within a facke; whereof the African Battalions made the fides; the Spaniards, Gaules, & Hannibal with his Carthagnians, the bottome; & Asdrubal with 10 his horse, closed up the mouth: in which part, they first of all were shuffled together, and beganne the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Amilius therefore, who could not fit his horse, whilest the battaile yet lasted, and whilest the spaces were somewhat open, by which he might have withdrawne himfelfe; was now (had he never fo well bin mounted) unable to flie, having in his way fo close a throng of his owne miserable followers, and so many heapes of bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It suffices h unto his honour, That in the Battaile he fought no leffe valiantly, than he had warily before, both abitained himselfe, and disswaded his fellow-Consult, from fighting at all. If. when the day was utterly loft, it had lien in his power to fave his own life, unto the good of his countrie, never more needing it; I should thinke, that hee either too much dif- 20 esteemed himselfe; or being too faintly minded, was wearie of the World, and his unthankefull Citizens. But if fuch a resolution were praise-worthy in Emilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English vertue of the Lord John Talbot, Viscount Lille, fonne to that famous Earle of Shrewsberg, who died in the Battell of Chastillon, more highly to be honoured. For Emilius was old, grievously, if not mortally, wounded & accomptable for the overthrow received: Talvot was in the flowre of his youth, unhurt, eafily able to have escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when he refused to forfake his Father; who foreseeing the losse of the battaile, and not meaning to staine his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble some to be gone and leave him.

In this terrible overthrow died all the Roman foot, fave two or three thousand, who (as Livie faith)escaped into the leffer campe; whence, the same night, about fixe hundred of them brake forth, & joyning with fuch of those in the greater campe, as were willing to trie their fortune, conveyed themselves away ere morning, about soure thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troupes, partly dispersed, into Cannusium : the next day the Roman camps, both leffe and greater, were yeelded unto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: onely hee reports, that the ten thousand, whom Amilius had left on the West side of Ausidus (as was shewed before) to set upon the campe of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their defire, which they had well-neere done, the battaile was loft : and Han-4 nibal, comming over the water to them, drave them into their own campe; which they quickly yeelded having lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is , that at the first fight of Hannibal, comming upon them with his victorious Army, a greater number of these did flie; and thereby escaped, whilest their fellowes, making defence in vaine, retired into their campe, and held the enemie busied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not halfe full, but made up by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that having ferved at Canna, were afterwards extremely difgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their companions fighting. Of the Romane horse what numbers escaped, it is uncertaine: but very few they were that saved themselves in the first charge, by getting behinde the River; and Terentius the Consull recovered Venusia, with threescore and ten at the most in his company. That he was so ill attended, it is no marvell: for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his neerest way thither, had beene through the midst of Hannibals Army, if the passage had beene open. Therefore it must needs be, that when once he got out of fight, he turned up some by-way; fo disappointing the Numidians that hunted contre. Of such as could not hold pace with the Confull, but tooke other wayes, and were scattered over the fields; two thousand, or thereabout, were gathered up by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slaine, all save three hundred; who dispersed themselves in slight, as chance, led them, and got into fundry Towns. There died in this great Battaile of Canna, besides L. Emilius Paulus the Consul, two of the Roman Quastors or Treasurers, and one and twenty Colonels or Tribunes of the Souldiers, four efcore Senators, or fuch as had borne office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of especiall marke, as having been Ediles, Prætors, or Consuls: among whom was Cn. Servilius, the last yeeres Consul, and Minutin, late master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battaile, Livie makes no greater than three thousand foot, & three hundred horsestoo few to have defended for the space of one halfe houre, both the Roman Camps; which yet the same Livie saith, to have binover-cowardly yeelded up. We may therefore doe better, to give credit unto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth, speaking in the Senate, & saying, That they were no lesse than eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were onely such as the Enemy pared, when the fury of Execution was past: but to these must be added about five thoufand more, who yeelded in the greater campe, when their company were either flaine or Acd. So the reckoning falls out right: which the Romanes, especially the Confull Varto, had before cast up (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable, as now they finde it. On the fide of Hannibal there died some soure thousand Gaules, fifteen hundred spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse, or thereabouts: a losse not sensible, in the joy of so great a victory; which if he had pursued, as Maharbal advised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the War had prefently been at an end. But he beleeved not fo far in his own prosperity; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get , not how to tofe a veffory.

Of things following the battaile at Canna.

TOt without good cause doth Polybim reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, unto whose honour they consecrated their travailes, than the truth of things, and information of posterity, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites, and Fathers conscript. No man of found judgement will condemne this liberty of cenfire, which Polybian hath used. For, to recompence his junioritie (such as it was) he produceth fub stantiall arguments, to justifie his owne Relation; and consuteth the vanity of those former Authors, out of their own writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which paines is to bee suspected, that he would not have taken, had he beene borne in either of these two Cities, but have spared some part of his diligence, and been contented, to have all men thinke better and more honourably than it deferved, of his owne Countrie. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter finde in others; and hall have some cause to wish, that either they were somewhat lesse Roman, or else, that ome Works of their opposite Writers were extant, that so we might at least heare both sides speake: being henceforth destitute of Polybins his helpe, that was a man indifferent. But fince this cannot be, we must bee sometimes bold, to observe the coherence of things; and believe fo much only to be true, as dependent upon good reason, or (at least) faire probabilitie. This attentive circum spection is needfull at the present: such is the repugnancie, or forgetfulnesse, which we find in the best Narration of things following the Battaile of Canna. For it is faid, that foure thouland foot & horse gathered together about the Confull Terentius at Venusia; that others to the number of ten thousand got into Cannussium, choosing for their Captaines, young P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Confull Terentius Varro, joyning his company unto those of Scipio at Cannusium, wrote unto the Senate, that he had now well-neere ten thousand men about him; that the letters of the Confull were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly rifen, that had beene taking order for pacifying those tumults in the City, which grew upon he first bruit of the overthrow; and yet, that Embassadours from Capua (after some onfultation, whether it were meet to fend any, or without further circumstance, to fide with Hannibal) were sent unto Terentius, and found him at Venusia, a pretty while beore he wrote those letters, which overtooke (in a manner) at Rome the first news of the

When Honnibal had facked the Roman camp, and truffed up the spoiles, forthwith he dislodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a disposition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to forfake the Roman partie, & make alliance with Carthave. The first towne that opened the gates unto him, was Coff a, where he laid up his baggage: and leaving his brother Mago to take in other places, He hasted into Campania. The generall affection of the multitude, in all the cities of Italy, was inclinable unto him: not onely in regard of their grievous losses, sustained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselves, who could not hinder him from spoiling the Country, especially the poorer fort of them, did hardly indure; but in a loving respect unto that great courtesse (as it feemed) which he used, unto such of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now also after his great victory at Canna, He had lovingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so obstinate against him that had sought to deliver them from bondage. Neither fpared he to win their love by gifts; pretending to admire their valour; but feeking indeed, by all wayes & meanes, to make them his, whileft all other motives were concurrent. At this time also he began to deale kindly (though against his nature) with the Roman prisoners; telling them, that he bore no mortall hatred unto their Estate; but being 2 provoked by injuries, fought to right himselfe and his countrie; and fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should beare soveraigne Rule, not. which of them should be destroyed. So he gave them leave to choose ten of their number, that should be sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ransome: and together with these, he sent Carthalo a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse. to feele the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by so much adversity. and could stoope unto desire of peace. But with the Romanes these arts prevailed not as shall be shewed in due place. The people of Italie, all, or most of them, save the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not onely wearie of their losses past; but entenained a deceivable hope, of changing their old Society for a better. Wherefore not only the Samnites , Lucans , Bruians , and Apulians , ancient enemies of Rome , and notuntill the former generation utterly subdued, began to re-assume their wonted spirits:but the Campans, a Nation of all other in Italy most bound unto the State of Rome, andby many mutuall affinities therewith as streightly conjoyned, as were any fave the Laines, changed on a fudden their love into harred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Province of Italie, if not (as somethen thought) of all the Earth: and the City of Capua, answerable unto the country, whereof it was Head, so great, faire, and wealthie, that it seemed no lesse convenient a seatof the Empire, than was either Rome or Caribage. But of all qualities, bravery is the least requifite unto foveraigne command. The Campans were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themselves like layes by their feathers, despised the unfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principall among them, as in other Cities, that bore especiall regard unto the Majestie of Rome, and could not indure to heare of Innovation. But the Plebeian faction had lately fo prevailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calavius an ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was up-held by furthering all popular defires: whereof, the conjunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offred their city to the Carthaginians shortly after the battaile of Thrasymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his journy into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting upon him. At that time, either the neernesse of the Roman Army, or some other seare of the Capuans, hindred them from breaking into actuall rebellion. They had indeed no leifure to treat about any article of new Confederacie: or had leifure ferved, yet were the multitude (whose inconstant love Hannibal had won from the Romans, by gentle ulage, and free dismissing of some prisoners in good account among them) unable to hold any fuch negotiation, without advice of the Senate; which mainely impugned it. So they that had promifed to yeeld up their town to Hannibal, & meet him on the way, with some of their nobility that should assure him of all faithfull meaning; were driven to fit still in a great perplexity: as having failed to let- in this their new friend, yet fufficiently discovered themselves, to draw upon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thermon grew the more incenfed against their Senate, on whom they cast all the blame, eafily pardoning their owne cowardize. The people holding fotender a regard of liberty. that even the lawfull Government of Magistrates grieved them, with an imaginary oppression; had now good cause to seare lest the Senators would become their Lords indeed. & by helpe of the Romans bring them under a more streight subjection, than ever they had indured. This feare being ready to breake into some outrage, Pacuvius made use of, to serve his owne ambition. He discoursed unto the Senate, as they fate in Counofell, about these motions troubling the city: and faid, That he himselfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and given his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of forfaking the Roman partie was not now the greatest ! for that the people were violently bent to murder all the Senate, & after to joyne themselves with Hannibal; who should countenance the fact, and fave them harmelesse. This he spake, as a man well knowne to bee beloved himselfe by the People, and privie unto their designes. Having throughly terrefied the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging over them: He promiled nevertheleffe to deliver them all, and to fet things in quiet, if they would freely put themselves into his hands; offering his oath, or any other affurance that they should demand, for his faithfull meaning. They all agreed. Then shutting up the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor iffue forth, without his leave: He called the people to affembly: and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would be glad to heare, he told them, that these wicked Governours were furprised by his policie, & all fast, ready to abide what sentence they would lay upon them. Onely thus much he advised them, as a thing which necessity required, That they should choose a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger upon the old. Sorehearfing unto them the names of one or two Senators, he asked what their judgement was of those. All cried out, that they were worthy of death. Choose then (faid he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the multitude, unprovided for such van election, was filent; untill at laft, some one or other adventured to name whom he thought fit. The men so nominated, were utterly disliked by the whole Assembly: either for some knowne fault, basenesse, and insufficiency; or else even because they were unknowne, and therefore held unworthy. This difficulty in the new Election appearing more and more, whilest more were to be chosen; (the fittest men to be substitued, having beene named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacurius intreated, and eafily prevailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time be spared, inhope of amends hereafter; which (doubtleffe) they would make, having thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not onely the people, as in former times, honoured Pacurius, and effeemed him their Patron; but the Senators also were governed by him, to whom they acknowledged themfelves indebted, for faving all their lives. Neither did the Senare faile after this by all obsequiousnes, to court the People; giving thereines unto their lawlesse Wil, who else were likely to cast them down. All the city being thus of one mind; onely feare of the Romans kept them from opening their gates 10 Hannibal. But after the Battaile at Canna, this impediment was removed: and few there were that would open their mouths to speake against the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principall Gentlemen of the Campans, did then ferve the Romans in the He of Sicil: the Parents and Kinfinen of these prevailed so far, that Embassadours were fent unto Terentius the Confull; to fee his present case, and what it could minister of Hope or Feare. These, wheresoever they found him, found him weakely attended, o^{andas} weake in spirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the service of their State; and defired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamentedunto them the greatnesse of the Roman misfortune : saying, that all was lost; and that the Campans must now, not helpe the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to ^{hel}pe themfelves, but make warre in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had fometimes done for the Campans against the Samnites. Hereunto hee is said to have added a foolish Invective against Hannibal and his Carthaginisms: telling , How he had taught them to make bridges of flaughtered carkafes, and to feed upon mans flesh; with such other stuffe, as only bewraied his own feare. As for the Campans themselves,

He put them in minde of their present strength: they having thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse; with mony, and all provisions, in abundance. Thus he dismissed them prouder than they came, and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before, they were somewhat timorous in adventuring to seeketheir own liberty. Having reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannzbal, with whom they easily made alliance, upon these conditions; That the Campane should be absolutely free, and ruled by their owne Lawes; That no Citizens of theirs should bee subject unto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soever, whether in Warre or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliver unto the Campans three hundred Romane prisoners, such as themselves would choose, whom they might exchange for to their Gentlemen which were in Sicil.

Against all this Negotiation, Decim Magim, an honourable Citizen, opposed himfelfe earneftly : using , in vaine , many perswasions, to the wilfull and head-strong Multitude; whom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were fending Embassadours unto Hannibal: and this alfo did he, when the new Alliance was concluded; but most carnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entring the towne : at which time he gave advice, either to keepe it out, or to fall upon it, and to cut it in pieces, that by such a notable piece of fervice, they might make amends unto the Romans, whom they had

Advertisement hereof was given to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farreoff. fent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: alledging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subjection unto any Carthaginan; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon hasted himselfe towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further upon Naples; which he thought to have taken in his way by Scalado, but found the wals too high, & was not well provided to lay fiegeunto it. At Capua he was entertained with great folemnity and pompe: all the people isluing forth of the towne, to behold that great Commander, which had won fo many noble victories. Having taken his pleasure in the fight of that goodly City, and passed over his first entertainements; He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, 20 in shaking off the Roman yokespromifing, that ere long all Italy and Rome it selfe, should be driven to acknowledge Capua as chiefe, and receive Law from thence. As for Deams Magine, who openly tooke part with the Romans their enemies; He prayed them, that they would not thinke him a Campan, but a traitor to the State, & use him accordingly, giving fentence out of hand upon him, as he deferved. This was granted: and Magus delivered unto Hannibal; who unwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first comming by putting fo great a man to death, yet fearing that they might fue for his liberty, if he kept him alive, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal setled his friendship with the Campanes: among whom, onely this Decius Magius had openly dared to speake against him; being affisted by Perolla the sonne of Pacuvius. This Perolla would a have murdered Hannibal, whilest he was at supper, the first night of his comming; had not his Fathers authority kept him from attempting any fuch attempt. All the towne (besides) were so earnest in the love of their new Society, that they are said to have murdered all the Romans, upon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to have smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, ranne some other townes thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-City. Nola, Nucerza, Naples, Casiline, and Acerra, were the Cities next adjoyning, that flood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakely manned; as they were indeed,

The Romanes at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled townes; but were faine to leave all places, except a few of the most suspected, unto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it selfe was in extreme seare of Hannibals comming, at the first report of the overthrow at Canne: and the griefe of that losse was To generall, and immoderate, that it much diffurbed the provision against apparent danger. It was hard to judge, whether the loffe already received, or the feare of defirmetion prefently threatning, were the more terrible. All the Senators found worke enough, to that the noy se and lamentable bewailings, whereof the streets were full. Courtiers were fent forth, to bring affured tidings how all went: whereof when Letters from the Conful Varro had throughly enformed them, they were fo amazed, that they raninto harharous superstition; and taking direction (as was faid) from their fatall bookes, buried alive two men and women, Gaules and Greekes, in their Oxe-market. If the bookes of Sie bulgave them fuch instructions; we may justly thinke that Sibyl her selfe was instructed by the Divell. Yet is it not improbable, that extremity of feare caused them to hearken to wicked Sooth-fayers; whose detestable counsels they afterwards, for their own honour (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the books of Sibyl. An Embassador was sent to Delphi, to confult with the oracle of Apollo; and enquire with what praiers and fupplicarionsthey might pacifie the gods, and obtain an end of these calamities. This is enough to discover the greatnes of their fear; though not serving to give remedy. At that time came Letters out of Sicil, from the Prætor Octacilius; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to passe over into Africk. In these were contained newes of one Carthaginian fleet that wasted the kingdome of Hieron their good friend & confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the Iles Egateis, which was in readineffe to fet upon Lilybaum. and the rest of the Roman Province, if the Prætor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron

In the middest of these extremities, it was thought needfull to call home Terenting the Conful, that he might name a Dictator, to take foveraigne charge of the Weale publique. with absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seeme strange, that all forts of people went forth to meet the Conful, and bid him welcome home, giving him thankes for that he had not despaired of the Weale publique . But this was done (as may seeme) by order from the Senate: which therein(doubtleffe) provided wifely for upholding the generall reputation. If his comming into the Citie had renewed the lamentations and outcries of the people: what elfe would have followed, than a contempt of their wretchednesse, among those that were subject unto their Dominion. Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gave it not) of bestowing upon him their welcome, and thanks: they nov fed abroad a fame, which came perhaps unto the eares of Hannibal, of their Magnanimity and Confidence: that might feem grounded on their remaining strength. This therefore was wifely done. But whereas Livie would have us thinke, that it was done gene Livibae. roufly, and out of great fpirit; let me be pardoned, if I beleeve him not. It was done fearfully, and to cover their griefe: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would have strucke off his head; as in few years after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question. and was banished by them being lesse blame-worthy, for a smaller offence. M. Tunius. by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and T. Sempronius, Master of the Livilibers. horfe. There fell preferrly to muftering of Souldiers of whom they raifed fourenew Legions, and 1000 horse: though with much difficulty; as being fain to take up some that were very boyes. These foure Legions are elsewhere forgotten in accompt of the forces levied by this Dictator; and two Legions onely fet downe, that had bin enrolled in the beginning of the year for custody of the City. So it may be that these two Legions be- 121,1116,23. ing drawn into the field; foure new ones of Pratextati, or striplings were left in their places. In fuch raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reafor they increafed their number, by adding unto them 8000. Rurdy flaves, that were put inhope of liberty, if they should deserve it by manfull service. This not sufficing; the Difator proclaimed. That who foever ought mony and could not pay it, or had committed any capitall offence, should forthwith be discharged of his debt or punishment, if he would serve in the War. To arme these Companies, they were fain to take down out of their Temples and Porches, the spoiles of their enemies that had bin there set up: among which, were 6000 Armors of the Gaules, that had bin carried in the Triumph of C. Flamining, a little before the beginning of this War. To fuch mockery had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their infolent oppressions, that they were fain to iffue forth of their own gates, in the habite of strangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman like.

About the same time it was that Carthalo, with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Canna, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the City, but commanded, while ft he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territory. To the messengers of the captives, audience was given by the Senate. They made earnest Petition to be ransomed at the publike charge; not only the teares and lamentation of their poor kinftolke, but the great need, wherein the City then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their

their fuite; which yet they obtained not. Besides the generall custome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was overthrowne, and taken prisoner in the former Warre) not to be too tender of such as had yeelded to the enemy; much was alledged against these who now craved ransome: but the speciall point was, that they were wilfully lost, since they might have savedthemfelves, as others did. It sufficed not unto these pooremen, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Confuls; they were told, that this was great prefumption. The truth was, the State wanted money; and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to avoid the disbursement: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we find recorded. Neither must wee regardit, that the flaves which were armed for the warre, are faid to have cost more, than the summe did amount unto, that would have ranfomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, devised to countenance the Roman proceedings, as if they had beene fevere; when as indeed they were sutable to the present fortune, poore, and somewhat beggarly. Hereof it is no little proofe, That Hannibal valued those Roman slaves, whom he had taken in the Campe among their Masters, at no more, than every one the third part of a common Souldiers ransome: and likely it is, that hee offered them at the price, whereat hee thought them current. But if we should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargain for flaves might have beene made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; vet must we withall consider, that these private men did onely lend these slaves for 20 a while unto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbeare the price of them (when by order of the Senate they were enfranchised) untill the Warre should be ended. If Hannibal would have given fuch long day of payment, it is likely that the Romans would have beene his Chapmen: but, feeing hee dealt onely for ready money, they chose rather to say, We will not give, than, We cannot. The like austeritie, upon the same reason, but contrary pretence, was used toward the souldiers that escaped from that great Battell. These were charged for having fled : as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might have done fo. True it is, that in such cases (if ever) that which they call raggione del Stato, may serve for an excuse: when the Common-wealth, being driven to a miserable exigent, is faine to helpe it selse, by doing injuries to private men. And so dealt the Romans now: condemning all those that had served at Canna, to bee transported into Siciland there to serve, not as others did, untill they had fulfilled twenty veeres in the Warres, or else were fifty yeeres of age; but untill this Warre should be ended, how long foever it lasted, and that without reward. The same thristy cenfure was afterwards layd upon others, for their mif-behaviour: but never upon any man of quality, fave only (a good while after this at better leisure) upon Cecilius Merellis. and a few other hare-brain'd fooles his companions; who, being frighted out of their wits, with the terrour of so great a losse, were devising, after the battell, which way to runne out of Italie, when Hannibal as yet had scarce one towne within it. The inequality of this rigour grew shortly distast full to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the people; neverthelesse it was quietly digested, the excuse being no lesse apparent than the fault.

M. Junius the Dictator, having dispatched all needfull businesse within the Citie, tooke the field with five and twenty thousand men. What he did with this Army, I cannot find : nor more of him than this, That he spent the time about Campania; where(as may be prefumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be afcribed, that Hannibal did no greater evill: for of any evill done to Hannibal, by the Romans, in this their weake estate, onely Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Oftia, with a Fleet ready to fet faile for Sicil, having one Legion abound his ships, and fifteene hundred other Souldiers newly taken up: with which forces hee was to defend that Iland, and doe what harme he could in Africk. But hearing of theoverthrow at Canna, he fent these of his new Levie to Rome, for defence of the Cirie; and marched hastily with his Legion toward Cannusium: delivering the Fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furim his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, and chiefe Citizens of Nola, to helpe them: who were like to be forced by the multitude (affected, as were the rest of the Campanes) to let in the Carthag mian; and knew not how to avoid this otherwise, than by seeming to deliberate about the articles of this new confederacie. Wherefore hee made great journies thitherward; and arrived even time enough to prevent the Enemy. Many idle walkes Hannibal made betwixt Nola and Naples: affaying by faire words and terrible threats the one and the other Citie. Naples was firong, and not infected with any the least touch of disloyaltie: had also a fure Haven, whereby it flood in the leffe feare of fultaining much inconvenience, by fpoyle of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrey. But at Nolait was thought a valuable confideration, That Hannibal was Master of the field which if he laid waste, all the poore people were utterly undone. So thought the Multitude: and fuch talk used some, that had little feare of their own private want or poverty, but a great defire to gratifie the Carthaomian. Of these, one L. Banting was chiefe; a stout young gentleman, and Souldier of to especiall marke, well beloved in the Citie, and one that had done good service to the Ramans; but was found by Hannibal halfe dead at Canna; and after much gentle usage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly difmiffed with liberall gifts. Hee therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to returne the greatest thankes hee could unto fo courteous an enemy. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought upon the same easie nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had beene by chance. feemed to wonder, why one that had fo well deferved of the Roman state, had not repaired unto him the Prætor, who defired nothing more than fuch acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and loving entertainment, being himfelfe also a man highly reputed for his personall valour, he made this Bantons to farre in love with him, that no-, thing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, whereof he had not presently advertisement. At the comming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola: and affaved, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; upon confidence whereof they gave him a peremptorie answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Nuceria, which he tooke by composition; and so returnedbacke againe to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore unto him: who although they durft not ftirre in his quarrell, being over-awed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly bestead, and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies affailing him without, like enough it feemed, that they would not be wanting unto the accomplishment of their owne desires. He therefore brought his Armie close to the Towne, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not inhope thereby to doe much good, but onely to make shew of a meaning to force the Towne; which he fought in the meane while to take by intelligence. In the night time there passed messages between him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marsellus, with all his forces, could be trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne should presently nie; and feizing upon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcelliswas advertised: and fearing left the Conspirators would shortly adventure, even to find him buffed within the Citie, whileft the Carthaginians should scale the walls; hee thought it the furest way, to cut off the enemies hope, and fend him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three companies, within three feverall gates, looking towards the enemy: he gave a streight command, that all the Citizens should keepe their houses. Thus he lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder against whom he had customarily issued forth before more early, every day, to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the walls were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that furely all was discovered, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon he bad his men bring ladders, and make ready for the affault: which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very walls, and thought nothing leffe, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: fuddenly the middle gate was opened, whereat Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Soulders, brake forth upon them, with a great noise, to make his unexpected fally the more terrible. Whilest the Carthaginians, much out of order, were some of them flying before Marcellu, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, whereat in like fortiffued they of the new levied Companies, upon the enemies backes. The fudden terrour was more availeable unto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was fo great, that this was accounted as a victorie, and reputed one of the bravest Acts performed in all that Warre, forasmuch as hereby it was first proved, that Hannibal might be overcome. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, tooke a strict account of the Citizens of Nola; condemning above threefc ore

threescore and ten of high Treason, whose heads he struck off; and so leaving the town in quiet obedience unto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Sueffula. Hannibal in the meane feason was gone to Acerra: where being excluded, hee thought it no wisedome to lose time in perswasions, but layd siege unto it, and began on all sides to close it up. This terrefied the People, who knew themselves unable to hold out. Therefore, before his Workes were finished, and they quite surrounded; they stole out by night, and left him the Town empty: which he facked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator, that he was about Casiline, thither went Hannibal; as being unwilling that an Enemie so neere should disquiet him at Capua; where he meant to Winter. Ir seemes, or rather indeed it is plain, that the late victory of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginian: who durst with a small part of his Army seeke out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemics, upon so flight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his men, at the most, and those not slaine in plaine battell, but by a sudden eruption; witnesseth chiefly in what great feare they flood of Hannibal, and how Crest-fallen they were that having three yeares fince demanded at Carthage the body of Hannibal, to bee delivered unto their pleasure, by his owne Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good newes, to heare, That in a skirmish not far from Rome, hee appeared to be a man, and nor refistlesse. At Casilinum the Dictator was not : but many Companies of Italians . Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Town, and held it. Five hundred of the Prane-ne fines there were, and about four hundred of Perufia, with some of the Latines. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the battell at Canna, being fent by their severall States to the Campe: whither whilest they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountred them, and fent them back forrowfull; for they loved well their Lords the Romans, under whose government they lived happily. So came they all, one after another, to Casiline, where they met and stayed. Neither had they staved there long, ere they heard newes from Capua, How that great Citie became the Ringleader of all the Campanes into rebellion. The people of Casiline were affected as theyof Capua: and therefore fought how to rid their hands of those Pranestines and their fellowes; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many traines laid one for. another, at last they slew all the Townsmen in a night, and fortified the Westerne part of the Towne (for it was divided by the River Vulturnus) against the Enemy. If they had run away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Casiline were as the rest of the Campanes, all Traitors; they themselves might have bin reputed, as no better than the Mamerines. But their constancy in defence of the place witnesseth, upon what honest reasons they surprised it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to have encountred with greater forces: but these few found him more worke than he expected. Divers affaults he gave, but was still repelled with losse: and many fallies they made, with variable event. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: opposing so much industry to his force, that he was driven to close them up, and seeke to winne them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Master of the horse, lay with the Roman Army higher upthe River: who faine would have relieved Casiline, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had given him expresse charge not to fight till his returne. Marcellus from Sueffula could not come: his way being stopped by the overflowings of Vulturnsu; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leave them, who were in danger of the Campanes, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water stayed his journey, such entreaties were needlesse. Neither is it like that the Dictator tarryed at Rome follong, as till extreme famine had confumed the Garrison in Casiline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Towne was lost, because the Romans durst not adventure to raise the siege. Barrels of corne were sent by night, floting down the River and when some of these, being carryed awry by an Eddie of the water, stucke among the Willowes on the bank, whereby this manner of reliefe was discovered and prevented; Gracebus cast a great quantity of Nuts into the streame, which faintly sustained the poore besieged men. At length when all food was spent, and what soever grew green under the Walles was gathered for Sallets, the Carihaginians ploughed up the ground; whereon the besieged presently sowed Rape-seede. Hannibal seeing this, admired their Captaines abroad. Wherefore it is no marvell, if the errand of Mago found extra-the Ring, was whereon the beneged prejently lowed Rape-lecte. The Ring was their patience; and faid, That he meant not to flay at Cafiline untill the Rapes were produced to the general province of this joy, Himileo, a Senator adverse to the facti-the general grown. Wherefore, though hitherto he had refused to hearken unto any Composition, of Hanno, is said to have demanded of that great persuader unto peace with Rome, the Roma E-asintending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their obstinacy; yet now he was content, to grant them their lives at an indifferent ranfom; which when they had paid, he quietly dismissed them, according to his promise. Seven hundred Carthaginians he placed in Casiline, as a Garrison for defence of the Campanes; unto whom he restored it. To the Pranestine Souldiers great thankes were given, and loving rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their prefent condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were in Praneste: which is no weake proofe, of the good estate wherein the Cities flourished, that were subject to the Roman Government. This siege of Casiline was not a little bene ficial I to the Romans; as having long detained Hannibal, and confumed much of his time, that might otherwise have bin better spent. For Winter overtook him long beforehe could dispatch the businesse: which how to quit with his honour he knew not. when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Army, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was. He therewithall did often beat the Romans in following times, as shall appeare hereafter.

Of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage to be sent to Hannibal into Italie. How by the malice of Hanno, and floth or parfimony of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Roman Historians how partiall they were in their writings.

Hen Mago, the fon of Amilear, had spent some time about the taking in of fuch Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battell at Canna; his brother Hannibal fent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyfull message of Victory. He told the Caribaginian Senate with how many Roman Generals his brother had fought, what Confuls he had chaced, wounded, or flain; how the stout Romans, that in the former war never shunned any occasion of fight, were now growne so calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the onely good Captaine, because he never durst adventure to come to battell; That, not without reafon, their foirits were thus abated, fince Hannibal had flaine of them above two hundred thousand, and taken above fifty thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Bruzans, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italy, that following the fortime of those great victories, had revolted unto the Carthaginians. Among the rest hee magnified Capua, as a goodly Citie, and fit to be not onely (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chiefe feat of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how lovingly his brother had bin entertained, where he meant to rest that winter, attending their fupply. As for the war, He faid it was even at an end, if they would 10w purfue it closely, and not give the Romans any breathing time, wherein to re-collect themselves, and repair their broken forces. He willed them to consider, that the war was far from home, in the Enemies Countrey; that so many battells had much diminished his brothers Armie: that the Souldiers, who had fo well deferved, ought to be confidered with liberall rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with . Thus Livie exactions of mony corne, and other necessaries; but that these things must be sent from reports it; and Caribage, which the victory would requite with large amends. Finally, hee caused credible it is thegolden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were flaine, to be was poore, the Powred out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bravery of pribushels, or (as others would rather have it) no more than one; adding, that by this might vate men was appeare the greatnesse of the Roman calamity, for as much as none but the * principall of logrest as the that order, were accustomed to weare that ornament.

Who fo considers the former Punicke Warre, may easily find, that the State of Car-though other thage never did receive, in all the durance thereof, any such hopefull advertisements from wife Just Annul.

CHAP.3. 9.10.

a Liv.1.22.

Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should be yeelded up unto the Romans. or whether he would forbid them to give thanks unto the gods, for this their good fueceffe. Hereuntothough it be not likely that Hanne made the same formall answer, which Livie puts into his mouth, calling the Caribaginian Senators Paires conscription a terme proper to the Romans; and putting them in minde of his owne shamefull overthrow received at the Ilands Agaieis: yet the summe of his speech appeares to have been no lesse malicious than it is set downe, for a smuch as Hannibal himselfe, at his departure out of Italie, exclaimed against the wickednesse of this Hanno; faying, that his hatred against the Barchines, had oppressed their Familie, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a jest of these victories, as is re- 10 ported; faying, It ill beseemed him, who had vanquished the Romans, to call for more help as if he had been beaten; or him, that had taken their camp, filled for footh with spoile, to make request for meat and mony. To these cavils, if answer were needful, it might be said, That other booty than of horses and slaves, little was to be found in the Roman Campe: the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few a filver stude in the bridles and trappings of their horses. If Hannibal had taken any maine convoy of mony and provisions, going to supply all wants of a great army in some other Province, (as the two Scipio's are afterwards faid to have done, when they wan the camp of Afdrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spaine, in his journey towards Italie) then might fuch an objection more justly have bin made unto his demand of a supply. But 20 the most likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein he best might hope to prevaile, contained a perswasion to use their fortune with moderation; and now to seeke peace, whilest they had so much the better in war.

What would have bin the iffue of this counfell, if it had bin followed, it were not easie to fay. For though it be likely, that the Roman pride would have brooked much indignity, in freeing Italy from the danger of war; yet it is not likely, that the faith, fo oftenbrokento the Carthagmians in former times, would have bin kept entire, when any opinion of good advantage had called for revenge of so many shamefull overthrowes stinceafter this war ended, and a new league concluded, no submissive behaviour could preserve Carthage from ruine, longer, than untill fuch time as Rome was at leifure from all other wars 30 This counfell therefore of Hanno, though it might feeme temperate, was indeed very pefilent; and served onely to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a maine confent of the Senate, that forty thousand Numidians, forty Elephants, and great abundance of filver, should be sent over to Hannibal: and that, besides thefe, twenty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, should be levied in Spain; not only to fupply, as need should require, the Armies in that Province, but to be transported into

This great aide, had it beene as carefully fent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not have found cause, to taxe the retchlesse improvidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Canna to Rome, or, in refreshing his Armie among the delights of Capua: the next yeeres worke would have finished the businesse, with leffe dangerous adventure; and the pleafures, which his men enjoyed among the Campanes, would have been commended, as rewards by him well thought upon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to be imployed in the following Warre. But either the too much carelesnesse of those, that were loth to make haste in laying out their money, before extreme necessity required it; or the crafty malice of Hanno, and his fellowes, working upon the private humours of men, that had more feeling of their owne commodity, than sense of the publike need; utterly perverted, and made unprofitable in the performance, the order that had beene so well set down. The bElephants were sent : and some money peradventure, uncertaine it is how long after. But those great forces of three score thousand foot, and four ethousand horse, came nor into Italy, till much was lost of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Armie, was first consumed by time, and fundry accidents of warre. Onely fome small numbers, no way answering unto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spaine; and the journey of Afdrubal thence through France into Italie much talked of but he not enabled thereunto, till many yeeres were past, and the Romans had recovered by the Tributes received from their subjects, and by their wealthy Trade of Merchandize. For it is not long, fince the Warre of the Mercenaries, and the perfidious tyranny of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessitie twelve hundred talents; had exceedingly impoverished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, even by the expence of fo much money, as was to be disburfed for redeeming of peace, after the losse at Loaneis. Yet we see, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, besides those already on foot, are appointed to the service in Italie, and how little the Carthaginians feare the want of money in these chargeable undertakings: whereas the Romans, on the other fide, having three or foure yeeres together beene forced to some extraordinary cost, are faine to goe upon credit, even for the price of those slaves, which they bought of their owne Citizens to arme for their defence. Such advantage, in meanes to enrich their Treasury, had the wealthy Merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterran Sea, even from Tyrus their Mother-Citie in the bottome of the ftreights unto the great Ocean, above the Romans: who lived on the fruits of their ground, and received their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leifure to shew it selfe, in the destruction of Carihage; the impudence of Roman falshood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discovered plainely whence the jealousie was bred, that this mighty City would againe rebell. For the Carthaginians, having given up hostages, even before the Roman Army did set forth, to perform what soever should be enjoyned them, with condition, that their City might not be destroyed; and having accordingly, when they were so required, yeelded up all their weapons, and engines of Warre; the Romans told them plainely, That the Citie of Carthage, which was the body of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall, but the Towns must needs be demolished, and removed into some other place, that should betwelve miles distant from the Sea. For (faid the Romans) This Trade of Merchandice, by which ye now live, is not so fit for peaceable men, such as ye promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of Husbandry; an wholesome kind of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies, and make them very apt Pfor conversation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glosing words, plainely shewes, what good observation the elder Cato had made of the hastic growth of Carthage in riches. For, when being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter what soever it were, he added still this conclusion, Thus I thinke; and that Carthage should be destroyed; Heemay seeme, not onely to have had regard unto that present wealth, which at his being there he had found in the City, but much more unto these times, and the great height whereunto it rose, even suddenly as we see, out of many calamities, whilest the Romans thought, that it had not bin in case to dare so terrible a War.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skilfull than the Romans; so came they far short of them in the honourable care of the publike good: having every one, or most of them, amore principall regard of his owne private benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the first heat of their affection (wherein they concluded to purfue the war ftrongly) was over-paft; goe more leifurely to work, than had bin requifite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to perswade covetous men, that they should first of all defend their own in Spain. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Province was fecured, they might fend an Army into Italie; so going to worke orderly by degrees. For it were no wisedom to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazzard of fortune, against the enemies; or (which perhaps were worse) to the government of an ambitious man, and his objethren; who having once (if they could so doe) finished the warre, might easily make *Hannibala King, and subdue Carihage, with the forces that they had given him to the Offich amconquest of Rome.

By fuch malicious working of Hanno, and by their owne flacknesse, incredulity, dul- fed Hannibal, nes, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were perswaded rather to make small disbursments made water, in Spain, than to fet up all their rest at once in Italy. Yet was it indeed impossible, to hold that o he might * Countrey of fo large extent, and fo open a coast as that of Spaine, free from all incursi-with Legions. thof the Enemy: especially the affection of the Naturals being (as in a new Conquest) as knowing no ilestablished. A better way therefore it had beene, to make a running Warre, by other way to which the Romans might have bin found occupied, even with the ordinary Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition thereunto. For ifit were thought meet, to defer the profecution of their maine intendment against Rome it self, untill such time as every little thorne were pulled out of the fides of so great a Province, then must Emporie have been befieged and forced: which, by reason of alliance with the Massilians, gave unto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the towne of Emperia was too strong to be wonne in haste: it had long defended it selfe against the Barbarians; having not above foure hundred paces of wall to the main Land, and exceedingly well fortified; a great Spanish Town of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compasse, very strong likewise, and friend unto the Gracians, though not o- 10 ver-much trusted. Wherefore to force this town of Emporia, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Massilians, Romans, and some Spaniards, would have bin a worke of little lesse difficulty, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battell at Canna: yea, it had bin in effect none other, than to alter the seate of the warre; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better judgement, neere unto the gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt, being such as caused it altogether to be forborn; great folly it was, to be much troubled about expelling the Romans utterly out of Spaine: whom they might more easily have diverted thence, and drawne home to their owne doores, by making strong war upon their Citie. For even so the Romans afterwards removed Hannibal into Africk, by fending an Army to Carthage; and by 20 taking the like course, they now endevoured to change the seate of the warre, transferring it out of Italy into Spaine. But the private affections of men, regarding the commongood no otherwise, than as it is accessary to their owne purposes, did make them eafily winke at opportunities, and hope, that fomewhat would fall out well of it selfe, though they fet not too their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch : yet they that thought him fo, were well enough contented to hearken unto his discourses, as long as they were plaufible, and tended to keepe the purse full. In the meane while they suffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilear, to weary themselves in travell for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in generall highly commended, but weakely affisted; as if the industry of these Barchines had bin somewhat more than needfull. Sure-30 ly the Carthaginians, in generall, were far leffe honourable than the people of Romanot only in government of their subject Provinces, but in administration of their own estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publike above their private interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parlimony used toward their own Mercenaries, when the former Roman warre was finished: so the conclusion of this war present, will make them complaine, with feeling fighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, afterthevictory at Canna; when gladly they would give all their Treasures, to redeeme the opportunity, that now they let paffe, as if it were cost enough to fend a few handfuls

That both the Spanish businesse, and the state of Africk it selfe, depended wholly, or 4 for the most part, upon successe of things in Italie, the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly, how matters were ordered in Spaine by the Carthaginian Governours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to setdowne. For, though we must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Livie, the tender love of his owne Countrey, which made him give credit unto Fabius and others: yet must we not, for his sake, beleeve those lies, which the unpartiall judgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gave them originall. It were needlesse to rehearse all that may bee found in Polybius, concerning the untruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He faith of Amilear and his men at Eryx, in the former war, That, having cleane spent their strength, and being even broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves unto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we finde in the life of Amilcar, fet downe by Emilius Probus, That Eryx was in such fort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any war. These words, being referred to the brave resolution of the Carthaginian souldiers, and the singular vertue of their Generall, insusing such spirit into them, may be taken as not over liberall. For in the treaty of peace betweene Amilear and Carulus when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Armes and for fake sicil, threatning, that otherwise hee would not talke of any composition

Amilear boldly bad him chuse, whether he would talke of it or no; for that the Armes which his Country had put into his hands to use against her Enemies, it was not his purpose to yeeld up unto them. Now fince the Romans, contrary to their custome upon like advantages, were content to let Amilear have his wil, & not to fland with him upon point of honour, whilest otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plaine enough it is, that they were farre from thinking him a man confumed with miferies, as Fabius would have him feem. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius; who flatly, and by name. chargeth Fabius with untruth; faying, that how foever Amilear and his Souldiers hadendured all extremity, yet they behaved themselves as men that had no sense thereof; and were as far from being either vanquished or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference betweene Fabius (as also perhaps between other old Writers of the Roman flory)& those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty city of Rome: we must rake it in good part, that how soever Livie introduceth Hanno, in one place, joyning very foolishly his own shamefull overthrow at the Ilands * Agateis, with the great * Agateis plates fervices of Amilear at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like event; yet elfwhere he for-Erycmque ante beareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his exclinitate own unhappy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affairs a Links, of Carihage went never better, than a little before the losse of their Fleet in that battell at Sea: wherein himselfe was Generall. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipeo's in Spain, there is cause to wish, that this Fabrus, with Val. Antias, & others of the like stamp, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Livie to his Rome, had not caused him to think too well of their rela-

§. X I.

Strange reports of the Roman victories in Spain, before Aldrubal the son of Amilcar followed thence his brother Hannibal into Italie.

Thath bin shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Conful, returning from Gaule into Italie, to encounter with Hannibalat his descent from the Alps, sent before him his brother Cnew, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spain. Two Roman Legions, with foureteene thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelve hundred horse, had been allotted unto the Conful therewith to make war in Spain against Hannibal: who since he was marching into Italie with the strength of his Army, P. Scipio beleeved, that a good part of these his own forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; & therefore made bold to carry fome of the number back with him, fending on his brother with the rest, as his Lievtenant. Publim himselfe remained in Italie all the time of his Consulhip: which being expired, he was fent Proconful into Spain by the Senate, with an Aromy of eight thousand men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Province, were very great; and, as they are reported, formewhat marvellous. For they continually prevailed in Spaine, against the Carihaginians: whom they vanquished in so many battels, and withdrew from their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that we have cause to wonder, low the enemy could so often find meanes to repaire his forces, and returne strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliver the Country from the tyranny of Carthage, might eafily win unto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the African yoake, and durst adventure to breake it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerors might serve to arme the Naturals against these Invaders; and to reclaime those, that had revolted unto the Romans, were it only by the memory of such ill succeffe, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian Treasure: which easily raised Souldiers, among those valiant, but (in that Age) Poore, and gold-thirsty Nations. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the spaniards had their children, kinfmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Itali-47 Wars; or serving the Carthaginians in Africk. And peradventure, if wee dutit be bold to fay it, the victories of the Scipto's, were neither fo many, nor fo great, as they are ferour by Livie. This we may be bold to fay, That the great Captaine Fabius, or Livie his person, maketh an objection unto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Livie for him, doth answer, That if Asdrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say, by him in Spaine: Grange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had beene extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italie. And it is indeed an incredible narration. That Astrubal, being enclosed on all fides, and not knowing how to escape out of bartell, fave onely by the steepe descent of Rockes, over a great River that lay at his backe. ranaway with all his mony, Elephants, and broken troups, over Tagus, directly towards the Pyrenees, and so toward Italie; upon which he fell with more than threescore thoufand armed souldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs well together, That hee chose a piece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his retrait, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that hee sent all his money and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the enemy: Or how it could be true, that thefe his Elephants, being fo fent before, could hinder the Romans (for so have they said to have done in the last battell between him and Scapes) from breaking into his Campe. Wherefore we canno more than be forry, that all Carthaginian records of this Warre, and Spanilb, (if there were any) being utterly loft, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell us; unto whom it were no wisedome to give too much credit. In this regard, I will fummarily run over the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine; not greatly infilling on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporia, an Haven towne, not farre within the Pyrenees . reraining still the same name with little inflection. That by the same of his clemencie hee 20 allured many Nations to become subject unto Rome, as the storie begins of him, I could eafily beleeve, if I understood by what occasion they had need to use his clemency, or he to give fuch famous example thereof, being a meere stranger, and having no jurisdi-Ction in the Countrey. Yet it is certain, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well infinuate himselfe into the love of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexterity in practice had the better successe, for that hee seemed to have none other errand. than fetting them at liberty. This pretext availed with some: others were to be hired with mony: and some he compelled to yeeld by force or feare; especially, when hee had won a battell against Hanno. Into all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is, that he remembred to infert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances never forgate; unlesse in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiors; Majestatem Pop. Rom; comiter conservent, which is, as Tullie interprets it, That they Bould genily (or kindly) uphold the Majestie of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome : yet implyed it indeed an obscure covenant of subjection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditionis Romana; of the Roman jurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Country wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italie; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Bargutians; Hannibal had found at his comming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not onely appointed Hanno Governour over them, as over the rest of the Province betweene Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceive it; for I doe not thinke he gave the Principality of their Country unto Hanno and his Heires,) He made him not onely Lievtenant-generall over them, in matters of Warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but tooke from them all inferiour Officers of their owne, leaving them to be governed by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to rejoyce at the comming of Scipio: with whom others also (no doubt) found reasons to joyne; it being the custome of all conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indiscreetly into the protection of others, that many times prove worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanois, in the age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turnes of the Spaniards and French; as more sensible still of the present evill which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, whereinto they ran by feeking to avoide it. This bad affection of his Province, would not fuffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had lest unto him: besides which it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his Province. Therefore he adventured a battell with Scipio; wherein hee was overthrown and taken. Following this victory, scipio befieged Stiffum, a towne hard by, and wonne

it. But Afdrubal having passed Iberus, and comming too late to the reliefe of Hanna. with eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, fell upon the Roman Sea-forces, that lav not farre from Tarracon, whom he found carelesse, as after a victory, roaving abroad in the countrey; and with great flaughter drave them aboord their ships. This done, hee ranne up into the Countrey, where he withdrew the Ilergetes from the Roman partie. though they had given Hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane season was gone to visit and aide his Fleet: where having fer things in order, he returned backe, and made toward Aldrubal; who durst not abide his comming, but withdrew himselfe againe over Iberus. So the Ilergeres were compelled by force; having lost Athanagia their chiefe to Citie, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their Hostages. The Aug Set ani likewise, Confederates of the Carihaginians, were besieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirty dayes; hoping, in vaine, that the sharpe Winter, and great aboundance of Snow that fell, would have made the Romans to dislodge. But they were faine at length to yeeld: and for this their obstinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of filver. During the fiege, the Lacetani came to helpe their diffressed Neighbours, and were beaten home by Scipio, leaving twelve thousand of their Company dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacetane, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should, without any cause remembred, become Carthagiman on the fudden, in the next newes that we heare of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, having lately become voluntarily dition's Roma-Livilbers. na, Subjett unto Rome, should, in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold Warre against Scipio, without any refistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I believe, that Aldrubal, as it were by a charme, ftirred up the Ilergeres, making them lay afide all care of their Hostages, and take Armes in his quarrell; whilest himselfe had not the daring to fland against Scape, but ranne away, and saved himselfe beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or fome Carthaginian Writer, would have told it thus: That Scipio adventuring too farre into the Countrey, was beaten by Afdrubal backe to his ships, whence he durst not stirre untill winter came on : at what time the Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Province, leaving fome few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Seiwonne, by returning upon them, unlooked for through a deepe fnow. As for the Lacuans, Ilergeres, and the rest, we may reasonably thinke, that they sought their owne benefit: helping themselves one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise, upon sense of injuries received, or apprehension of more grievous tyranny, under which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, hearkening againe unto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to live under their owne Countrey Lawes, and not under Governours fent from Rome or Caribage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testifie: even from henceforth unto the dayes of Augustus Cafar; till when they were never throughly conque-

The veere following this, Cn. Scipio had a victory against the Carthaginians in fight at Sea; or rather came upon them unlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships, that ranne not too farre on ground, he tooke: and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defenced. After this victory, above one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty Estates in Spaine, are faid to have submitted themselves unto the Romans, or given Hostages: whereby Asdrubal was compelled to slie into the utmost corners of the land, and hide himselfe in Lucitania. Yet it followes, that the Ilergetes did againe rebell; that Asdrubal hereuponcame over Iberus; and that Scipio (though having eafily vanquished the Ilergetes? went not forth to meet him, but stirred up against him the Celiberians, that lately were become his subjects, and had given him hostages. These tooke from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquished him in two battels; wherein they flew fifteene thousand of his men, and tooke foure thousand Prisoners. Then arrived P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and henceforward the two brethren Joyntly administred the businesse in Spaine.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian Warre; the two Scipio's did halid cunstanier, without both feare or doubt, passe over Iberus, and besieged Saguntum. Little Guse of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it; and, among many others, the same Celiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Aldrubala

Asdrubal. Bostar, the Governor of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himself to be perswaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the only way to get the favor and hearty good will of the country, was by freely restoring unto them their hostages; as resting, without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the crafty Spaniard, being trusted with this message and restitution of the hostages, carried them all to the Roman Generals: perswading them. as he had done Bostar, to make the Liberality their own. Hereby the Komans purchased much love, if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward, and ere this we find, that all the Spanish Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearfing fo many particularities, whereof I can beleeve fo few. But fince we find no better certainties, we must content our selves with these. The yeare following was like unto this: Afdrubal must be beaten again. The two 10 Scipio's divide their forces: Cn. makes war by Land, P. by Sea. Afdrubal, with much labour and entreaty, hath gotten foure thousand foot, and five hundred horse out of Africk: He repaires his Fleet; and provides every way to make refistance. But all his chiefe Sea-men, and Masters of his ships, revolt unto the Romans: because they had bin chidden the last years for their negligence, which had betrayed the Navie. The revolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an In-land people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spaine. These doe much mischiese, so that Asdrubal is faine to make a journey to them. His fudden comming cuts off some of them. that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they making head, so valiantly affaile 20 him, that they drive him, for very feare, to encampe himselfe strongly on an high piece of ground; whence he dares not come forth to give them battell. So they take a Town by force, wherein he had laid up all his provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Country round about. This good successe breeds negligence; for which they dearely pay. Afdrubal comes upon them, takes them unprepared, beats them kils the most of them, and disperseth the rest; so that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Asdrubal should leade his Armie forth into Italie; which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint himto doe, if they had bin informed by his letters in what hard case he was; and had so weakly supplied him, as is shewed before. But thus we find it reported: and that upon the very rumour of this his journey, almost all Spaine was ready to fall to the Romans. Afdrubal therefore fends word presently to Carthage, That this must not be so: or, if they will needs have it fo, that then they must fend him a Successor, and well attended with a strong Army, which to imploy they should find worke more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moved with this excuse; Asarubal must needs be gone: Himilco, with such forces as are thought expedient for that fervice, both by land and fea, is fent to take the charge of Spain. Wherfore Afdrubal hath now no more to doe, than to furnish himselfe with store of money, that he might have wherewithall to win the friendship of the Gaules; through whole Countries he must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carihaginians were 40 greatly too blame, for not remembring to ease him of this care. But fince it can be no better, he layes great Impositions upon all the Spaniards his subjects: and having gotten together as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Siapio's hearing these newes, are carefull how to arrest him on the way. They besiege Ibera (so called of the Rivers name running by it) the richest towne in all those quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal: who thereupon steps aside to relieve it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battell with him: which they winne the more eafily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather be vanquished at home, than get the victory, and afterwards be haled into Italie. Great numbers are flaine: and few should have escaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away ere the battels were fully joyned. Their Campe 50 the Romans take and spoile: whereby (questionlesse) they are marvellously enriched; all the mony that could be raked together in Spaine being carried along in this Italian expedition. This dayes event joynes all Spaine to the Romans, if any part of the Country flood in doubt before; and puts Afdrubal fo far from all thought of travelling into Italie, that it leaves him small hope of keeping himselfe safe in Spaine. Of these exploits advertisement is sent to Rome; and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are; That they have neither mony, apparell, nor bread, wherewith to fultaine their Army and Fleet; That all is wanting: fo as unlesse they may be supplied from Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarry any longer in the Province. These Letters come to Rome in an evill season; the State being scarcely able, after the losse at Canna, to helpe it selfe at home. Yet reliefe is sent: how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that love and care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare unto the Common-wealth, shall be inferted else-where, into the relation of things wherof the truth is leffe questionable. At the comming of this supply, the two Scapie's purfue Aldrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What elfe can we thinke, that remember the last newes of him, and how searefully he mistrusted his owne safety : They find him, and Mago and Amilear the fon of Bomilear, with an Army of threefcore thoufand men, befreging Illiturgi: (which the learned Orielius, and others, probably conje-10 Aure to have stood, where Carinnena is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon; for there was Illiturgis, afterwards called Forum Julis, quite another way) a Towne of the Illergeres their neerest Neighbours, for having revolted unto the Romans. The towne is greatly distressed; but most of all, for want of victuals. The Romans therefore brake through betweene the Enemies Campes, with terrible flaughter of all that refift them: and having victualled the place, incourage the townef-men to defend their walls as floutly, as they should anon behold them fighting manfully with the befregers, in their behalfe. So they iffue forth, about fixteen thousand against threescore thousand; and killing more Liv. lib. 23. of the enemies, than themselves were in number, drave all the three Carthaginian Commanders, every one out of his quarter; and tooke that day, befides prisoners and other bootie, fifty and eight Enfignes.

The Carthaginian Army, being thus bearen from Illiturgi, fall upon Incibili, that flood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning money by warre, for thus re-inforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondred, whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them: fince Afdrubal was lately driven to poll the Countrey, wanting money of his owne; and being beaten in his journy, had loft his wealthy carriages, when his Campe was taken after the battell by Ibera. Howfoever it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custome) are beaten againe at Incibili: where there were of them above thirteene thousand slaine, Liv. 1616. o and above three thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spaine fell from them unto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius Antius, or some other Historian, to whom Livie gave credit, conquer all Spaine twice in one yeere, by winning famous victories; whereof these good Captaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithstanding this large accesse of Dominion, winter on their owne lide of Iberus. In the beginning of the next yeere, great Armies of the Spaniards rife against Asdrubal; and are overthrowne by him. P. Scipio, to helpe these his friends, is forced to make great hast over the River. At Castrum Altum, a place in the mid-way between new Caribage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilear, Pubhur Scipio incampeth: and stores the place with victualls, being strong and defencible; as intending to make it his feate for a while. But the Countrey round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse have charged the Romans in their march, and are gone officience; falling also upon some stragglers, or such as lagged behinde their fellowes in march, they have cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behovefull, to tetire unto fome place more affired. So Publ. withdrawes himselfe unto Mons vistoria: that rifing fomewhat Eastward from Incibili, over-looketh the Southerne Out-let of lberus. Thither the Carchaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repaires unto him; and Afdrubal the fon of Gesco, with a full Army, arrives to help his Companions. As they lie thus neere incamped together, P. Scipio, with some light-armed, going closely to view the places thereabours, is discovered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that hewithdrawes himselfe to an high piece of ground; where they besiege him, untill his brother Cn. fetcht him off. After this (but I know not why) Castulo, a great city of Spain, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being farre distant from them, and seated on the head of the River Bæis. Neverthelesse the Carthasmians passe over Iberus, to besiege Illiturgi againe, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison; hoping to win it by famine. We may justly wonder, what should move them to neglect the rebellion of Castulo, yea and the Roman Army lying so close by them, and to seeke adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had been so grievously beaten the yeere before. But thither they goe : and thither followes them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breakes out upon them the next day, and in two battels kils above twelve thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prifoners, with fixe and thirty Enfignes. This victory (doubtleffe) is remarkeable : confidering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than five thoufand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remove to Manda; where the Romans are foone at their heeles. There is a great battaile fought, that lasteth foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victory; and a more notable would have gotten, had not Cn. Scipio beene wounded. Thirty nine Elephants are killed, & twelve thousand men; three to thousand prisoners taken, and seven and fifty Ensignes. The Carthaginians slie to Auringes; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquished the Carthaginians againe: but kils not halfe so many of them, as before: good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed even by nature fo fer war on foot, quickly fill up the broken troups of Afdrubal, who having also hired some of the Gaules, adventures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe: and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are even ashamed to leave Saguntum enthralled unto the Carthaginians; fince, in behalfe of that Citie, they had at first entred into this warre. And well may we thinke it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, fince we may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Country once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were faine (as appeares) to goe their way without it: fo as they need not to blush, for having so long forborne to doe that, which ere now they had attempted, but were unable to performe. At the present they wonne Saguntum: and restored the posseffion thereofunto such of the poore dispersed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Country of the Turdetani, that had ministred unto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be affured, that the Carthaginians would have di-30 flurbed them, if they had beene able.

But over-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans have gotten in Spaine, other print or token of all their brave exploits, we can perceive none, than this recovery of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Afdrubals journey; which was indeed of greatest importance, but appertaining to their owne desence. For they have landed at Emporia, an Haven towne, built and peopled by a Colony of the Phoceans, kinne to the Massilians, friends to the Romans; They have easily wonne to their party, loft, recovered, and loft againe, some petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perfivation, other-whiles by force, and sometimes by their owne unsettled passions; and now finally they have won a Town, whereof the 40 Carthaginians held intire possession, who had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may eafily believe, that when they tooke Saguntum (if they tooke it not by firprise; which is to be suspected, since in this Action we finde no particulars remembred, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like sort also must we thinke, that all those battailes lately remembred, after every one of which Afdrubal fate downe before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebell, were prosperous unto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquished, to carry the warre from Towne to Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselves within their owne places of strength, and therein to attend the levie and arrivall of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had beene absolute Masters of the field, when they wonne Saguntum, they would not have confumed a whole yeere following, in practifing onely with the Celiberians the next adjoyning people. Yet made they this, little leffe than two yeers businesse. Of these Celuberians we heare before, That they have yeeldedup themselves unto the Romans; for security of their faith, given Hostages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to serve in the Roman camp. How this may hold together I cannot perceive; unlesse perhaps in those daies it were the Raman custome, or rather the custom of some bad Author whom Livie followes, to call every messenger, or straggler, that entred their campe, an Hostage of that people from whom he came.

entred their campe, an Hostage of that people from whom he came. The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, fend an Army of thirty thoufind to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fittest men are chosen, and carried into Italy, there to deale with their Country-men that follow Hannibal in his warres. But if any of these three hundred returne backe into Spaine, it is to be feared, that he brings with him such newes of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men, that all his fellowes at home are the leffe unwilling to follow Afdrubal, when he shall next have adefire to leade them into Italy. Hereof we finde more than probability, when these mercenary Celtiberians meet the Caribaginian Army in the field. The two Scipio's, prefuming on this accesse of strength divide their forces, and seeke out the Enemies, who lie not farre off with three Armies. Aldrubal the sonne of Amilear, is neerest at hand; even among the Celtiberians, at Anitorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed; Mago the sonne of Gesto, hearing the newes, will make use of their distance, which is five dayes march, and, by running into the furthest parts of the Country, save themselves from being over-taken. Publish therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better fouldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Armie; leaving the third part, and all the Celubersans, to his brother. He that hath the longer journey to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his lives end. Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gefco, are not studying how to runne away: they finde no such necessity. They jovne their forces together meet with Publim Scipio; and lay at him so hardly, that hee is driven to keepe himselfe close within his Trenches: wherein he thinkes himselfe not well affured. Especially he is vexed by Masanassa, Prince of the Massassi, Numidians, bordering upon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizen: to whom the chiefe honour of this service is ascribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Remans. In this dangerous case, P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis a Spanish Prince, iscomming with seven thousand & five hundred of the Suefferani, to joyne with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be streight shut up, and besieged, he issues forth by night, to meet with Indibilia upon the way; leaving T. Fomeius his Lievtenant, with a small company to defend the camp. He meets with Indibilit; but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first incounter. The fight continues so long, that the Numidian horse appeare (whom he thought to have beene ignorant of his departure) and fall upon the Romans on all sides: neither are the Caribaginians farre behinde; but come so fast upon him in Reare, that P. Scipio, uncertaine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men, where need most requireth, is strucke through with a lance, and slaine: veny few of his Army escaping the same destinie, through benefit of the darke night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twenty dayes after. At his meeting with Aldruwhalthe Celtiberian Mercenaries all for take him; pretending that they had warre in their owne Country. If Anitorgis, where Asdrabal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Beuterus takes it, a Celiberian towne; this was no vaine pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may justly believe, that they were won by Afdrubal, and eafily perswaded to take as much mony for not fighting, as they should have had for hazzarding their lives. En. Scipio therefore being unable to stay them, and no lesse unable, without their helpes either to refist the enemy, or to joyne with his brother, maketh a very violent retrait; berein onely differing from plaine flight, that he keeps his men together. Afdrubal prefheth hard upon him: and Mago, with Afdrubal the sonne of Gesco, having made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio steales from them all, by night; but is overtaken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stomy ground, where growes not so much as a shrubbe, unfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill he findes of easie ascent on every side; which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with packe-faddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Pallisado. These weake desences the Carthaginiand some teare in funder and, breaking in on all hands, leave very sew of them alive; that faving themseives, I know not how, within some woods adjoyning, escape unto au. Fonteiss, whom Publius had left in his camp, as is before faid. It is a terrible overthrow, they fay, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on Bbbbb 2 every fide, in so bare a ground as affoorded not a shrub to cover them, could breake out, and throwd themselves within woods adjoyning, I should much wonder; did not a greatermiracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteins is in P. Scipio's campe, on the North fide of Iberus, fearcfull (as may be supposed) of his owne life; since his Generall, with two parts of the Roman Armie, had little hope to remaine long fafe within it. Thither comes L. Martim, a yong Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit : who having gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawne some Companies out of their Garrifons, makes a pretty Army. The Souldiers, being to choose a Generali by most voices, preferre this L. Martins before Fonteins the Lievtenant, as well they may. For Aftrubal, the sonne of Gesco comming upon them; this L. Martim so incourageth his men, 10 (fondly weeping when he led them forth, upon remembrance of their more honourable Generalls lately flaine) and admomsheth them of their present necessity, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victory perhaps he might have gotten, but that he wisely founds the retrait; reserving the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldnesse growes, in enemies lately vanquished, and now againe little better than taken: but when they fee, that the Roman dares not follow his advantage, they return to their former security; and utterly despising him, set neither Corps de garde nor Sentinell, but rest fecure, as if no enemy were neere. Marine therefore animates his fouldiers with lively words; and tells them, That there is no adventure more fafe, than that which is fur-20 theft from suspition of being under-taken. They are soone perswaded to sollow him, in any desperate piece of service. So he leades them forth by night, and steales upon the Campe of Afdrubal: where finding no guard, but the enemies faft afleepe, or very drow zie, He enters without resistance, fires their Cabbines, and gives a terrible alarme; fo that all affrighted, the Carthaginians runne head-long one upon another, they knownot which way. All passages out of their Campe, Marius hath prepossessed, so that there is no way to escape, fave by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many doe, as can thinke upon it, and run away toward the Campe of Afdrubal the fonne of Amicar, that lay fixe miles off. But Marins hath way layd them. In a Valley between their two campes he hath bellowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of 30 Horse; sothat into this Ambush they fall every one, and are cut in pieces. But lest perchance any should have escaped, and give the alarme before his comming; Martin hastens to be there as soone as they . By which diligent speed, He comes early in the morning upon this further campe: which with no great difficulty he enters, and partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceived, when they beheld the Roman fhields, foule, and bloudied with their former execution, He drives head-long into flight, all that can fave themselves from the fury of the sword. Thirty seven thousand of the enemies perish in this nights worke; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty, taken prisoners. Hercunto Valerius Antius addes, that the campe of Mago was also taken, and seven thousand slaine: and that in another battaile with Asarubal, there were 4 flaine tenthousand more; besides soure thousand three hundred and thirtie taken prifoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Livie therefore hath elsewhere well obferved, That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antius, in multiplying the numbers that have fallen in battailes. That, whilest Marius was making an Oration to his fouldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Livie reporteth as a common tale, not giving thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Captaine Martin gota great name; which he might well doe, if with fo finall forces, and in fuch diffreste, He could cleerely get off from the Enemies, & give them any parting blow, though it were farre leffe than that which is here fet downe.

Of these occurrents L. Marine sent word to Rome, not forgetting his owne good service, what foever it was, but fetting it out in fuch wife, as the Senate might judge him worthy to hold the place of their Vice-gerent in Spaine: which the better to intimate unto them, He stiled himselse Propretor. The Fathers were no lesse moved with the tidings than the case required : and therefore tooke such carefull order, for supplying their for ces in Spaine, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the companies le vied to serve in that Province, could be sent away; yet would they not stay a tide for defence of the City it selfe , but shipped them in all haste for Spaine. As for that titled Propretor, which Mariem had affumed, they thought it too great for him, and week offended at his prefumption in usurping it: foreseeing well, that it was a matter of ill consequence, to have the Souldiers abroad make choice, among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Provinces. Therefore C. Claudens Nero was disparched away, with all convenient hafte, into Spaine: carrying with him about fixethousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

Ithappened well, that about these times, the affaires of Rome began to prosper in Italy, and afforded means of fending abroad fuch a strong supply : otherwise, the victories of Martin would ill have ferved, either to keepe footing in Spaine, or to stop the Carthaomian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing with his newforces, tooke charge of that remainder of the Army, which was under Marina and Fornesius; he found furer tokens of the overthrowes received, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martin had made his vaunts unto the Senate. The Roman party was forfaken by most of the Spanish friends: whom how to reclaime, it would not easily be devised. Yet Claudius advanced boldly towards Afdrubal the brother of Hannibal: whom he found among the Auferani, neer enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lavides arre; out of which there was no iffue, but only through a freight, whereon the Roman seized at his first comming. What should have tempted any man of understanding to incampe in such a place, I do not finde: and as little reason can I find in that which folblowed. For it is faid, That Afdrubal, seeing himselfe thus locktup, made offer to depart forthwith out of all Spaine, and quit the Province to the Romans, upon condition, that he and his Armie might bee thence dismissed; That he spent many dayes, in entertaining parlee with Claudius about this businesse; That night by night he conveighed his footmen (a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking advantage of a mifty day, He stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leaving his Camp empty. If we confider, that there were at the same time, befides this Astrubal, two other Caribaginian Generalls in Spaine; we shall finde no lesse cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargaine for so great a Country, with one of these three Chieftaines, than at the strange nature of those passages, through which the footmen could hardly creepe out by night; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a darke misty day. Wherefore in giving beliefe to fuch a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Caribaginians were, and the conditions offered for their fafe departure, to have been of far leffe value. Howfoever it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could do, served to purchase any new friends in Spaine, or to recover the old which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Marieus their Propretor, tooke it not well, that the Senate, regardlesse of their good deserts, had repealed their election, and sent a Propretor whom they fancied not fo well. Some such occasion may have moved them todesire a Proconsull, & (perhaps) yong Scipto by name: as if a title of greater dignity were needfull to worke regard in the Barbarians; and the beloved memory of Cn. and Publim, likely to doe good, were it revived in one of the same samily. Whether upon these, or upon other reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Province; and Publius the sonne of P. Scipio sent Proconsul into Spaine.

This is that Scipio, who afterward transferred the warre into Africk: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Country. He was a man of goodly presence, & singularly well conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Continency, Bounty, and other vertues that purchase love; of which qualities what great use he made, shall appeare in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, savouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanity; How he uled to walke alone in the Capitoll, as one that had fome fecret conference with Jupiter; How a Dragon (which must have beene one of the gods; and, in likelihood, Jupiter himselfe) was thought to have conversed with his Mother, entring her Chamber often, and vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he noutifhed the rumour, by doubtfull answers; I hold them no better than fables, devised by Historians, who thought thereby to adde unto the glory of Rome: that this noble City might seeme, not onely to have surpassed other Nations in vertue of the generality, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is lest out, that might serve to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as matter of unquestionable truth, That when a Proconsull was to be chosen for Spaine, there durst not any Captaine of the principall Citizens offer himselse as Petitioner for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the people of Rome were much aftonished thereat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citic stood looking one another in the face, not one of them having the heart, to adventure himfelfe in fuch a desperate service; and finally, That this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about sourc & twenty yeers of age, getting up on an high place wherehe might be feen of all the multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred upon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martin no better than dreames: and either very unreasonable was the seare of all the Roman Captains, who durst not follow Clau-10 dim Nero, that not long before was gone into Spain Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard even now, was ready to abandon. But upon these incoherences, which I finde in the two partiall

Roman Historians, I doe not willingly infift. P. Scipio was fent Proconfull into Spaines & with him was joyned M. Junius Syllanus as Propretor, and his Coadjutor. They carried with them tenne thousand foot, and a thousand horse, in thirty Quinquereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emporia; & marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the fame of Scipio's arrivall, it is faid, that Embaffages came to him apace from all quarters of the Province: which he entertained with fuch a majestie, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the 20 enemies, they were greatly affraid of him: and fo much the greater was their feare, by how much the leffe they could give any reason of it. If we must beleeve this, then must we needs beleeve, that their feare was even as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrefied with the fame of fo young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (or, as some thinke, all the next yeare) hee did nothing: but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprize was against new Carthage: upon which he came unexpected, with five and twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; his Seaforces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. He affailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and wonne it by affault the 30 first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much considence upon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might have beene well enough defended, if some Fisher-men of Tarracon had not discovered unto Scipio, a fecret passage unto the walls; whereof the Towns-men themselves were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could have no notice. This Citie of new Caribage, refembled the old and great Caribage in fituation; standing upon a demy-Iland, betweene an Haven and a great Lake. All the Westerne side of the walls, and fomewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake : which the Fisher-men of Tarracon had founded; and finding some part thereof a shelfe, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deep, or (at most) wading up to the Navill, Scipio thrust thereinto some com- 40 panies of his men; who recovered the top of the walles without refiftance: the place being left without guard; as able to defend it selfeby the natural strength. These falling suddenly upon the backes of the Caribaginians within the Citie; easily forceda gate, and gave free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Towne, Livie himselfe cannot certainly affirme; but is faine to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasury, we may easily perceive how great a vanity it was to fay, That all the wealth of Africk and Spaine was heaped up in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adjoining Provinces) whom Scipio intreated with fingular courtesie; re-50 storing them unto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thankes due to so great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celiberians, and two petty Kings of the Ilergetes and Lacetani, neerest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North-side of Iberus, for sooke the Caribaginian party, & joyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended: for that he did not vaunt himself, as commonly fugitives use, of the pleasure, which he did unto the Romans, in revolting from their enemies, but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians, & invited by the honourable dealing of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeed no unsure token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Ilergeres had long ere this (as wee have heard before) for saken the Carthaginian party, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Cn. Scipio: then could nothing have bin devised more vaine, than this Oration of Indibily their King; excusing, as new, his taking part with the same, when hee should have rather craved pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Uncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howsoever the two elder Scipio's had gotten fome few places among these their Neighbours, & held them by strength; yet were the Romans never masters of the Countrie, till this worthy Commander, by recovering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, won unto himselfe the affured love and affistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generalls, when they heard of this loffe, were very forry: yet nevertheleffe they fer a good face on the matter; faying, That a young man, having stolne a Towne by surprise, was too farre transported, and over-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Uncle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more convenient temper.

of the Historic of the World.

Now if I should here interpose mine owne conjecture; I should be bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time busie, in setting forth towards Italy; and that Scipio, to divert them, under-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Uncle, upon the like occao sion, sate downe before Ibera: And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not beene much amisse, if the passage over the Lake had beene undiscovered, and the Towne held out some longer while. For how soever that particular Action was the more fortunate, incomming to fuch good iffue upon the first day: yet in the generality of the businesse, between Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Astrubal should be stayed from going into Italy, than that halfe of Spaine should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to do, that should hinder his journey; Mago, & Afdrubal, the sonne of Gesco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio worke, in that lingring warre of taking and retaking Townes, whileft the maine of the Carthaginian forces, under Afdrabal, the fon of Amilear, went to a greater enterprise : even to fight in triall of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italy: whither he ran for feare, as thinking himselfe ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, fay they, comming upon Asdrubal; his Vant-currers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horse, that they drave them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, even by that small peece of service, how full of spirit the Roman Army was, and how dejected the Enemie. Afdrubal therefore by night retyred out of that even ground, and occupied an Hill, compaffed on three fides with the River, very steepe of ascent, and not easie of accesse on the foreside, by which himselfe got up, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plaine, whereon he strongly encamped himselfe: and in the mid-way, betweene thetop and root of the Hill, was also another Plaine; into which he descended, more upon bravery, that he might not seeme to hide himselfe within the Trenches, than for that he durst adventure his Army to the hazzard of a battaile, for which this was no equall ground. But such advantage of place could not save him from the Romans. They climed up the Hill to him; they recovered even footing with him; drove him out of this lower Plaine, up into his Campe on the Hill top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got up before them, they drave both Men and Elephants head-long, I know not whither: for it is faid, that othere was no way to flie. Out of fuch a battaile, wherein hee had loft eight thousand men, Asdrubal is faid to have escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troupes, to have marched towards the Pyrenees, having fent away his Elephants cre the fight began. Neverthelesse, Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gesco, are reported after this, to have consulted with him about this Warre; and finally to have concluded, that goe he needs must, were it but to carry all the Spaniards as far as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to have bin true, it shall appeare at his comming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires have too long detained us.

6. X I I.

The fifth Booke of the first part

The great troubles that Hannibal raifed in all quarters, to the Citic of Rome. Posthumius the Roman Generall, with his whole Army, is slaine by the Gaules. Philip King of Macedon enters into a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans joyning with the Etolians, make warre upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him, the better to intend their businesses against the Caribaginians.

TEeleft Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates rejoyced (as may be thought) not a little, to heare the good newes from Carthage of fuch mighty aide, as was decreed to be fent thence unto him. To In former times he had found worke enough, to carry the Romans corne into his owne barnes, and to drive away their Cattell to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, than sustenance for his Army ; by making him Master of the open field. He might perhaps have forced some walled townes, in like fort as he did Geryon, and the Castle of Canna: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Army must have endured the Winter and Spring sollowing, untill come were ripe, would have grievously punished him for such implovment of the Summer. This may have been the reason, why he forbore to adventure upon Rome, after his victory at Canna. For had hee failed (as it was a matter of no certainty) to carry the Citie at his first comming 5 want of victuals would have compel-20 led him to quit the enterprise. Yea, many of the people that opened so hastily their gates unto him, upon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe, would have taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the event of another battaile: if being, either for want of meanes to force the Citie, or of necessaries to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might feeme) from the walles of Rome, he had prefented himselfe unto them with alessened reputation, somewhat later in the yeere; when time to force their obedience was wanting, unleffe they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and travell was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the yeere following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receive a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay fiege unto that proud Citie, 30 which folong had held them in subjection. Thus the Winter was passed over joyfully, faving that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to fecond the welcome report of those mighty forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drewon: and of the promifed supply there arrived no more, than onely the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not: onely we finde, that after this he had above thirty of them; whereas all, fave one, that he brought over the Alpes, had bin loft in his journey through the Marishes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make unto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truely, what mischieses the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Caribaginians. Otherwife, they might perhaps informe him, that it was 40 thought a safer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spaine and Gaule, as he himselse had done; and increase the Army, by hyring the Barbarians in the journey; thanto commit the maine strength of their Citie, to the hazzard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Haven, to receive the Fleet that should carry such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needfull provisions. With these allegations Hanmbal must rest content; and seeke, as well as he can, to satisfie his Italian Consederates. Therefore when time of the yeere ferved, Hetooke the field: and having finished what rested to be done at Cassilinum, sought to make himselfe Master of some good Haventown thereabout; that might serve to entertaine the Carthaginian Fleet, or take from his Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the same 50 purpose, and to doe what else was needfull, He sent Himilto unto the Locrians, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to affay all quarters of Italy, yea, the Iles of Sicil and Sardinia; fince the fiege of Rome must needs be deferred unto another yeere. Hanno made an ill journey of it, being met, or over-taken, by T. Sempronius Longus : who flue above two thousand of his men; with the losse of fewer than three hundred Romans. But Himileo fped farre better. By helpe of the Bruians, his good friends, he won Petellia, or Petilia by force; after it had held out some moneths. He won likewise Confentia; and Croton, that was forfaken by the Inhabitants. Also the City of Locri, which was of great importance, yeelded unto him: as did all other places thereabout; except onely the Towne of Rhegium, over against Sicil.

The great faith of the Pecilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable testimony of the good government, under which the Roman subjects lived. As for the Samnites, Campanes, and others, whose earnestnesse in rebellion may seeme to prove the contrary; we are to confider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Soveraignty, and were now transported with ambition: which reason can hardly moderate, or benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did fend to Rome for helpe: where their Messengers received answer from the Senate. That the publike misfortunes had not eleft meanes, to relieve their Associates that were so farre distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed; as were all others, publikely sent from Cities of the Roman subjection, that had a private jurisdiction within themselves) fell down to the ground, and humbly befought the Fathers, not to give them away: promiting to do and suffer what soever was possible, in defence of their Towne, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to confultation againe: and having throughly confidered all their forces remaining, plainely confessed, that it was not in their power to give any reliefe. Wherefore thefe Embaffadours were willed to returne home, and to bid their Citizens provide hereafter for their owne fafety, as having already discharged their faith to the utmost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was faid) held out some mooneths: and having striven in vaine to defend themselves, when there was no apparent possibility, gave to the Carthaginians a bloudy victory over them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Affailants. The Romans at this time were indeed in such ill case, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Caribage, might have reduced them into termes of great extremity. For whereas, in a great bravery, before their loffe at Canna, they had shewed their high mindes, by entertaining the care of things farre off, not with standing the great warre that lay upon them fo neere at hand: it now fell out miferably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better than at home. L. Posthumius Albinus their Prætor they had sent, with an Army of five and twenty thousand, into Gaule; to the Illyrian King Piness they had fent for their tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past, willing him, if he defired forbearance, to deliver hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had fent, to require, that he should deliver up unto them Demevius Pharius, their Subject and Rebell, whom he had received. But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little futable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumius with all his Army was cut in pieces by the Gaules, in such fort, that scarce tenmen escaped. The manner of his overthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gaules, Litana; through which he was to passe. Against his comming, the Enemies had fawed the Trees so far, that a little force would serve to cast them downe: When therefore Posthumius, with his whole Army, was entred into this dangerous passage, the 6 Gaules, that lay about the wood, began to cast downe the Trees: which falling one against another, bore all downe so fast, that the Romans were over-whelmed, Men and Horses; in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before. How this tedious worke of fawing fo many Trees, could take defired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might have blowne all downe before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the device was subject; I do not well conceive. Yet fome fuch thing may have beene done : and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the favage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Country now fo civill, was infected in elder times, That of Posthumius his skull, being cleansed, and trimmed 10 up with gold, a drinking cup was made, and confecrated in their principall Temple, as an holy vessel, for the use of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great overthrow, when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no leffe than the calamity. But forrow could give no remedie to the mischiese: and anger was vaine, where there wanted forces to revenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither doe I finde, that any was a second time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, & Scerdiletus Illyraan Kings, as also with Gentius, who reigned within a few yeeres following, the Romans dealt upon even termes; entreating their affiftance against Philip and Perseus; not commanding their dutie, as Vaffalls. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For having affured his affaires in Greece, & enjoying leifure to looke into the doings abroad, He fent Embassadors to Hannibal: with whom he made a league, upon these conditions; That the King in person should come into Italy, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, affift the Carthaginians in the Roman war, untill it were finished; That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the spoile thereinto begotten, should be left entire unto the State of Carthage; And that afterwards Hannibal with his Army should passe into Greece, and there affift Thilip, untill he had subdued all his Enemies: (which were the Liolians, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leaving femblably unto him the full possession of that country, and the Iles adjoyning. But such predisposition of Kingdomes and Provinces, is lightly comptrolled by the divine Providence, which therein shewes 10 It selfe; not (as Herodotus failly termes it, and like an Atheift) envious or malicious, but very just and majesticall, in up-holding that unspeakable greatnesse of Soveraignty, by which It rules the whole World, and all that therein is. The first Embassadours that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their journes towards Hannibal: & being examined what they were, adventured upon a bold lie, faving, That they were fent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and People, and offer his helpe in this time of great necessity. These newes were so welcome, that the joy thereof tooke away all care of making better inquiry . So they were lovingly featted , and freely difmiffed with guides that fhould leade them the way, and shew them how to avoide the Carthaginians. But they being thus 20 instructed concerning their journey, fell wilfully into the campe of Hannibat: who entertained them after a better fashion; and concluded the businesse, about which they came, upon the points before remembred. In their returne homeward, they happened againe unluckily to be descried by the Roman sleet; which, mistrusting them to be of the Carthaginian party, gave them chace. They did their best to have escaped : but being over-taken, they suffered the Romans to come aboord; and trusting to the lie that once had served them, said it againe, That having beene sent from King Philip, to make a league with the People of Rome, they were notable, by reason of the Carthaginians lying between, to get any farther than to M. Valerus the Prætor, unto whom they had fignified the good affection of the Kingtheir Mafter. The tale was now leffe credible than 30 before: and (which marred all) Gefco, Boftar, and Mago, with their followers, Caribaginians that were fent with them from Hannibal to ratifie the agreement, being prefent Ty detected, made the matter apparent. Wherefore a little inquilition ferved to finde all out: so that at length Hannibals owne letters to King Philip were delivered up, and the whole businesse consessed. The Embassadours and their followers were sent close prifoners to Rome: where the chiefe of them were cast into prison; and the rest sold for bond flaves. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon new Embaffage was fent that went and returned with better fpeed; concluding, as was agreed before; onely with some losse of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heavie weight this Ma-40 cedonian warre, in an evill houre, was likely to fall upon them, when their shoulders were over-burdened with the loade of the Carihaginian. Yet they tooke a noble refolution; and futable unto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would have beaten upon them from Spaine. They judged it more eafie, with small forces to detaine Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to refist him in Italy. And herein they were in the right. For, that the very reputation of a King of Macedon, joyning with Hannibal in such a time, would have sufficed to shake the allegeance, not onely of the Launes, and other, their most faithfull Subjects, but even of the Roman Colonies, that held all priviledges of the City, it will appeare by the following successe of things. M. Valerius the Prætor, with twenty Quinquereme Gallies, was appointed to attend upon the Macedonian, and 50 to fet on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles already thereinbegunne. Philip was bufie about the Sea-townes, that looked towards Italy, fetting upon Apollonia; and thence falling upon Oricum; which he won, and so returned to Apollomia againe. The Epirots craved helpe of M. Valerius: or rather accepted his kinde offers; who had none other busines to do. The garrifonthat Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Towns-men in good order; but not to keep out the Romans: of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Phalip as then had no suspition. Valerius therefore easily regained the Towne; and sent thence 2 thousand men, under Navius Crispus, an under-taking and expert Captaine; which got by night into Apollonia. These made a notable fallle; and brake into Philips Trenches with so great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his campe, and raise the siege. The King purposed (as it is said) to have departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, comming with his fleet from Oricum, stopped up the mouth of the River, so that he was faine to burn his ships, (which belike were no better than long boates) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this Valerius dealt with the Etolians, a Nation alwayes enemy to the Crowne of Macedon: & easily perswaded them (being so affected, as hath elfe-where beene shewed) to make strong warre on Philip; wherein he promised them great affiftance from the Romans. That which most moved the troublesome spirits of 10 the Atolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; & whereof the Roman was as liberall in making promife, as if already it had bin his owne. So a league was made between them: and afterward folemnely published at Olympia. by the Etolians; and by the Romans, in their Capitoll. The conditions were, That from Ftolia to Coreyra, in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Countrey should be subdued, and left unto the Atolians, the pillage onely to begiven to the Romans. And that if the Atolians made peace with Philip, it should be with Provision. to hold no longer than whilest hee abstained from doing injurie to the Romans, or their Affociates. This was indeed the onely point, whereat Valerius aimed, who promifed as much on the Romans behalfe, That they should not make peace with the Macedonian. unlesse it were with like condition of including the Etolians. Into this league was place referved for the Laced amonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or favoured the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalm, Pleuratus, & Scerdiletus: the first of which reigned at Pergamus, in Alia the leffe, a Prince hereafter much to be spoken of; the other two held some part of Illyria, about which the Romans were fo farre from contending with them, that gladly they fought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Affociates are thrust into the Treatie, rather to give it countenance, than for any readinesse which they disclose to enter thereinto. The Ecolians alone, and chiefly Scopus their Prætor, with Doo rymachus and others, are yet a while the onely men, of whom the Roman Generalls must make much; as the late French King, Henry the fourth, when he had onely the title of Navarre, was faid to court the Maiors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when hee heard whereunto the Etolians tended. He repaired his Army; made a countenance of warre upon the Illyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infest the Kingdome of Macedon; wasted the Countrie about Oricum & Apollonia; and overrunning the Pelagonians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held fuspected, came downe into Theffaly, whence he made shew as if he would invade Atolia. By the same of this Expedition, He thought to ftir up all the Greeks adjoining, against the Etolians; whom they generally detected as a neft of Robbers, troublesome to all the Country. To which to purpose, and to hinder the Liolians from breaking into Greece, He left Persens, his son and heire, with foure thousand men upon their borders: with the rest of his Armie, before greater businesse should over-take and entangle him, Hee made a long journey into Thrace, against a people called the Medes: that were wont to fall upon Macedon, whenloever the King was absent. The Etolians, hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Acarnanians; in hope to subdue those their daily enemies, and winne their little Countrie, ere he should be able to returne. Hereto it much availed that the Romans had already taken Oeniada and Nanos, Acarnanian Townes, conveniently fituated to let in an Army; and configned them unto the Atolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the flout resolution of the Acarnanians, o to die (as we fay) every Mothers fonne of them, in defence of their Country; together with the great haste of the Macedonian (who layed aside all other businesse) to succour these his friends; caused the Liolians to forsake their enterprise. When this Expedition was given over, the Romans and Evolians fell upon Ancyra, which they tooke: the Romans affailing by Sea, the Etolians by Land. The Etolians had the Towne, and the Romans the spoile.

For these good services M. Valerius was chosen Consult at Rome; & P. Sulvicius sent in his flead, to keepe the warre on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman helpe, Analus Out of Afia came over to affift the Atolians. Hee was chiefly mooved by his owne jealousie of Philips greatnesse: though somewhat also tickled with the vanity of being chofen by the Etolians their principall Magistrate; which honour, though no better than titulary, he tooke in very loving part. Against the forces which Attalus and the Romans had fent, being joyned with the maine power of Liolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battailes: and was victorious in each of them. Hercupon, these his troublesome neighbours defired peace of him, and used their best meanes to get it. But when the day appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: their Embassadours, instead of making fubmiffion, proposed unto him such intolerable conditions, as ill beseemed vanquished men to offer: and might therefore well testifie, that their minds were altered. It was not any love of peace, but feare of being befieged in their owne Towns, that had made to them defirous of composition. This feare being taken away, by the incouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as ever : and thrust a garrison of their owne. and some Roman friends, into Elis; which threatned Achaia, wherein Philip then lav. The Romans, making a cut over the streight from Naupastus, wasted the countrey in a terrible bravery: wherein Philip requited them; comming upon them in great haftfrom the Nemaan Games (which he was then celebrating) and fending them fafter away but nothing richer, than they came.

In the heate of this contention, Prulius King of Buhynia, fearing the growth of Attalui, no leffe than Att alus held suspected the power of Philip, sent a Navie into Greece, to affift the Macedonian party. The like did the Carthaginians: and upon greater reason; as 20 being more interessed in the successe of his affaires. Philip was too weake by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships, yet the vessels were such, as could not hold out against the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoved him, to use the helpe of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late: which might better at first have kept those Enemies from fastening upon any part of Greece, than afterward it could ferre to drive them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that country. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needfull that he should correct the Eleans, bad neighbours to the Achaians his principall Confederates. But in affailing their Town, hee was incountred by the Aulian and Roman garrison, which drave him backe with fome loffe. In fuch cases, especially where God intendeth agreat 30 convertion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. The King had received no great detriment, in his retrait from Elie : rather he had given testimony of his personal valour in fighting well on foot, when his horse was staine under him. He had also soone after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of foure thousand, with some twenty thousand head of Cattell, which they had brought together into a place of safetie, as they thought, when their Country was invaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman for ragers about Sieyon, his horse running hastily under alow tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Creft. This was gathered up by an Atalian, who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philips death. The horne was well knowne, and the tale beleeved. 40 All Macedon therefore was in an uproare : and not onely the Borderers, ready to fall upon the Country, but some Captains of Philip, easily corrupted; who thinking to make themselves a fortune in that change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home, leaving not three thousand men, to affist his friends the Achaans. He also tooke order, to have Beaconseracted, that might give him notice of the Enemies doings, upon whom he meant shortly to returne. The affaires of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went il-favouredly : especially in the Ile of Eubæa, where one Plator betraied to Assalm and the Romans, the Towne of Oreum, ere Philip could arrive to helpe it: where also the strong City of Chalcis was likely to have been lost, if he had not come s the fooner. He made such hastie marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the City of Opus: This City, lying over against Eubaa, Attalus had wonne, more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had used : now because the Roman Souldiers had defrauded him in the facke of Oreum, and taken all to themselves; it was agreed, that Airalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians, without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whils he was busie, in drawing as much mony as he could out of the Citizens: the fudden tidings of Philips arrivall, made him leave all behinde him, and runne away to the Sea-fide, where he got aboord his ships, finding the Romans gone before, upon the like feare. Either the indignitie of this misadventure, or tydings of Prusian the Bythinian his invasion upon the kingdome of Pergamun; made Attalou returne home, without staying to take leave of his friends. So Philip recovered Opus, won Torone, Truonos, Drymu, and many finall towns in those parts; performing likewise some actions, of more braverie than importance, against the Atolians. In the mean season, Machanidas, the Tyrant of Lacedamon, had beene busie in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philips arrivall, was returned home.

The Lacedemonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, went about to choose two new kings, and to conform themselves to their old maner of government. But their estate was so far out of tune; that their hope of redressing things within 10 the Citie, proved no leffe unfortunate, than had bin their attempts of recovering a large dominionabroad. Lycurgus a tytant role up among them: upon whom fucceeded this Machanidas, and fhortly after came Nabis, that was worsethan both of them. They held on the Etolian and Roman fide, for feare of the Acheans, that were the chiefe Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant and Laced amonian. But of these we shall speake more hereafter.

CHAP.2. $.12.

Philip entring into Achaia, and feeing his presence had brought the contentment of affurance to that Countrey; spake brave words to the Affembly of their States, faying, That he had to doe with an Enemie, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalen, to Ordam, to Opin, and now into Achasa: but could no where finde them, fuch hafte they made, for feare of being overtaken. But flight, he faid, was not alwayes prosperous: he should one day light upon them; as ere this he fundry times had done, and still to their losse. The Acharans were glad to heare these words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For he restored unto their Nation some Townes that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolirans their Confederates, he rendered Aliphera. The Dymaans, that had beene taken by the Romans, and fold for flaves, he fought out, ranformed, and put in quiet possession of their owne Citie. Further, passing over the Corimbian Gulfe, he fellupon the Liolians; whom he drave in-30 to the mountaines and woods, or other their strongest holds, and wasted their Country. This done, he tooke leave of the Achaans, and returned home by Sea, vifited the people that were his subjects, or dependants; and animated them so well, that they rested fearelesse of any threatning danger. Then had he leisure to make war upon the Dardamans, ill neighbours to Macedon: with whom nevertheleffe he was not fo far occupied. but that he could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred gallies, whereby to make himselfe Master of the Sea; the Romans (fince the departure of Attalus) having not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ranne along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they lav.

This good fuccesse added much reputation to the Macedonian, and emboldened him o to make strong warre upon the Ætolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans, ei ther some displeasure, conceived against their Confederates, or some seare of danger at home, when Afdrubal was ready to fall upon Italie; caused them to give over the care of things in Greece, and leave their friends there to their owne fortunes. The Atolians therefore, being driven to great extremitie, were faine to sue for peace unto Philip; and accept it, upon what ever conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirty five gallies, came over ingreat halte (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Etolia, he turned a fide to Dyrrachium and Apollonia, making a great noife, as if with these his owne forces he would worke wonders. But it was not long ere Philip o came to visit him, and found him tame enough. The King presented him battell, but he refused it: and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Country round about, before his cies, kept himselse close within the wals of Apollonia, making some Overtures of peace : which caused Philip to return home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be dis-Pleased with the Licitans, as had Philip, to take inevill part the demeanor of the Carehaginians. For, notwithstanding the royall offer that he made them, to serve their turne in Italie, and affift them, in gerting their hearts defire, before he would expect any requitall: they had not fent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of sufficient abilitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Armie, or to free his coast from the Roman and Ætolian Pyracies. Onely once they came to his helpe, which was, at his last journey into Achara. But they were gone againe before his arrivall: having done nothing, and pretending feare of being taken by the Romans, even at fuch time as Philip, with his owne Navie, durft boldly paffe by Sea. and found none that durst oppose him. This retchlesse dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seeme to have bin one of Hanno his tricks, whereof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieve this malicious man exceedingly, to heare that fo great a King made offer to serve in person under Hannibal, and required the affistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affaires of the world at pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as Envie could suggest, to perswade the to Carthaginians unto a safe and thrifty course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian warres so mighty a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection unto Hannibal, more dangerous to their liberty. Ratherthey should doe well to save charges, and feed the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promifes of fending a fleet and some other succours. This would cost nothing, yet would it serve to terrefie the Romans, and compell them to fend part of their forces from home, that might finde this Enemie worke abroad. So should the Roman Armies bee lessened in Italie; and Philip, when once he was ingaged in the warre, be urged unto the prosecution, by his owne necessitie: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges; yea, scarce to the labour of giving him thankes. Now if it 20 might come to passe, as Hannibal every day did promise, that Rome, and all Italy should within a while be at the devotion of Carthage: better it were, that the Citie should be free, so as the troublesome Greekes might addresse their complaints unto the Carthaginians, ascompetent Judges betweene them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal. with the power of Africke, should wait upon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries, as would both make the name of a Caribaginian hatefull in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no leffe impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsell of Hanno and his fellowes were such as this, or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition, without his advice, were too sparing, and carelesse, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they 30 did him no manner of good, but rather dodged with him, even in their little courtesse which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why hee began the building of an hundred Gallies, as if he would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would have reached, had he not vainely given credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Atolians had submitted themselves already: and when

The vanity of which their conceits would appeare unto them, when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the yeere following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retaine three or foure Townes of Illyria, which they had recovered in this war, being part of their old Illyrian conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore perhaps inserted into the covenants, that somewhat might seeme to have beene gotten. On the other side, the Aimtanes were appointed to returne under the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably conjectures) the people of the Countrey about Apollonia, then did 50 the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appeares, that they did not give peace, as they would feeme to have done, but accepted it, upon conditions fomewhat to the Romans defired his friendship, as might be thought, for very feare of him, with reputation enough, and not as a forfaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to have succoured them in their necessitie, he might give over the warre, and, without re-prehension, leave them to themselves. For he had wilfully entred into trouble for their fakes: but they despised him, as if the quarrell were meerely his owne, and he unable to 40

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias King of Bithynia, the Achaens, Baoitans, Thessalians, Acarnanians, and Epirots. On the Roman fide were named, first, the people of Ilium, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Pergamus; Pleuratus an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis the tyrant of Lacedamon; together with the Eleans, Meffenians and Athenians. The Avolians were omitted, belike, as having agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Atolians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their league with Philip) were also inserted by the Romans; that were never flow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Atbenians: they flood much upon their old honour; and loved to beare a part, though they did nothing, in all great actions. Yet the fetting downe of their names in this Treaty, served the Romans to good purpole: for a finuch as they were a buffe people, and ministred occasion to renew the War, when means did better ferve to follow it.

How the Romans began to recover their strength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieving the publike necessities of their Common weale.

T was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the halves: and wasted more men and money to no purpose, than would have served (if good order had been taken) to finish the whole Warre, in farre shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This errour had become the leffe harmfull, if their care of Italy had bin fuch as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal to weary himselse with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from yeare to year, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a Conquerour could have defired. The death of Posthumius, and destruction of his whole Army in Gaule; the begun rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations, much to their prejudice, in the whole Isle of Sicil; as alfo that War, of which we last spake, threatned from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that so nearely after their terrible overthrow at Canne, among so many revolts of their Italian Confederates; would utterly have funke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the first year, yet at least the second, sent over to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that even this diversity of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administred matter unto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, wherupon to work. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italy: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new concurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their severall Armies. This had not been a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had been throughly prosequited: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperity of Hannibal in his Italian Warre, should have been strengthened; whatfoever had become of the rest. But the slender Troupes, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the Warre in Spaine; the lingring and which they fent to uphold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already well-neare beaten downe; their trifling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hasty catching at Sicil: little deserved to be thought good reasons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather every one of these Actions, considered apart by it selfe, was no otherwife to be allowed, as discreetly undertaken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, That the care of Italy made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things elie. Yet if these allegations would not serve to content Hamibal, then must be patiently endure to know, that his owne Citizens were jealous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at Whatfoever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himfelfe to Necessity; to feed his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Co. me, and other places: being loth to spend his Army in an hard siege, that was to be referved for a worke of more importance. Many offers he made upon Nola, but alwayes with bad fucceffe. Once Marcellus fought a battell with him there: yet under the very Walles of the Towne; having the affiftance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman fide, fince the Heads that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off-About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight lost: which was no great marvell; his forces being then divided, and imployed in fundry parts of Italy at once. Naples was even in those dayes, a strong City; and required a years work to have taken it by force.

Wherefore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get it, was alwaies frustrate. Upon the town of Cumæ they of Capua had their plot, and were in hope to take it by cunning. They sent to the chief Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Campans) to be preto the chief Magistrates of the Nation, where they would consult about their general sent at a solemne facrifice of the Nation, where they would consult about their general sent at a solemne facrifice of the Nation, where they would consult about their general sent at a solemne facrifice of the Nation, where they would consult about their general sent at a solemne facrifice of the Nation of Superiorism Grachus the Roman Consult tertaine; but privily seat word of all to T. Sempronius Grachus the Roman Consult.

Gracehus was a very good man of warre, and happily chosen Consull in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should have beene Posthumius Albinus, that was lately slaine by a time. His Colleague should have beene Posthumius Albinus, that was lately slaine by the Gaules: after whose death Marcellus was chosen, as being judged the fittest man to to the Gaules: after whose death Marcellus was chosen, as being judged the fittest man to to the Gaules: after whose death Marcellus is or at least they fained so to have done, been that nullished the election of Marcellus; or at least they fained so to have done, been that nullished the election of Marcellus; or at least they fained so to have done, been that they sate the first time, that ever two Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcause this was the first time, that ever two Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcause substituted in his roome. But Fabius was detained in the City, about matters of rewas substituted in his roome. But Fabius was detained in the City, about matters of ligion, or Superstition: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, ligion, or Superstition: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, ligion, or Superstition: where was alone, with a Consular Armie, waited upon Hannivery much troubled. So Gracehus alone, with a Consular Armie, waited upon Hannivery much troubled. So Gracehus alone, Whilest the Consull was thus busied at Linternum, the Senators of Cuma sent him word of all that had passed betweene them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to flesh his men, and make them consident against the Enemie; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracehustherefore put himselse into Cuma: whence he issued at fuch time, as the Magistrates of that Citie were expected by the Campans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hama, three miles from Cuma. There lay Marius Alsius the chiefe Magistrate of Capua, with sourceene thousand men; not 30 wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather devifing how to surprise others, than fearing himselfe to be affailed. The Consultherefore, fuffering none to goe forth of Cuma, that might beare word of him to the Enemies, issued out of the towne when it grew darke : his men being well refreshed with meate and fleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights fervice. So he came upon the Capuans unawares, and flew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander, losing not above a hundred of his owne men. Their campe he tooke; but tarried not long to rifle it, for feare of Hannibal, who lay not far off. By this his providence, he escaped a greater losse, than he had brought upon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hama, forthwith he mar-40 ched thither: hoping to finde those young fouldiers, and slaves, busied in making spoyle, and loading themselves with the bootie. But they were all gotten safe within Cuma; which partly for anger, partly for defire of gaining it, and partly at the urgent entreatie of the Capuans, Hannibal affailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill successe, the Carthaginians and their fellowes spent about this towne. They raised a woodden Tower against it; which they brought close unto the walls; thinking thereby to force an Entrie. But the Defendants, on the infide of the wall, raifed against this an high Tower; whence they made refiftance, and found meanes at length to confume with fire the worke of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were busic in quenching the fire, the Romans, fallying out of the towne at two gates, charged them valiantly, and drave 50 them to their Trenches, with the flaughter of about foureteene hundred. The Confull wifely founded the Retrait, ere his men were too farre engaged, and Hannibal in a readinesse to requite their service. Neither would he, in the pride of his good successe, adventure forth against the Enemie; who presented him battell the day following, neere unto the walls. Hannibal therefore, seeing no likelihood to prevaile in that which he had taken in hand, brake up the fiege, and returned to his old campe at Tifara. About these times, and shortly after, when Fabius the other Consull had taken the field; some small towns were recovered by the Romans, and the people Teverely punished for their revolt.

The Carthaginian Armie was too small, to fill with garrisons all places that had yeel-ded; and withall to abide (as it must doe) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supply from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome, it selfe, was driven in the meane time to alter his course of war: and, in stead of making (as formerly he had done) a generall invasion upon the whole Countrie, to passe from place to place; and wait upon occasions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemy, than to him. The Country of the Hirpines and Sammites was grievously wasted by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal: as also was Campania, by Fabius the Consulty when Hannibal having sollowed Marcellus to Nola, and received there the losse before mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. These people shewed not the like spirit indefending their lands, and sighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalfe, to get the Soveraignty. They held it reason, that they should be protected by such as thought to have dominion over them; whereby at once they overburdened their new Lords; and gave unto their old, the more easie meanes to take revenge of their defection.

meanes to take revenge of their defection. The people of Rome were very intentive, as necessity constrained them, to the worke that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Confulship: and joyned with him Marcus Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed unto that honour the yeare before. Of these two, Fahing was called the Shield: and Marcellus the Roman Sword. In o Fabius it was highly, and upon just reason, commended, That being himselfe Consul. and holding the Election, he did not stand upon nice points of formality, or, regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but caused himselfe to bee chosen with Marcellus. knowing in what need the City stood of able Commanders. The great name of these Consuls, and the great preparations which the Remans made, served to put the Campans infeare, that Capua it felfe should be besieged. To prevent this, Hannihal, at their earnest entreaty, came from Arpi . (where he lay, hearkening after newes from Tarentum) and, having with his presence comforted these his friends, fell, on the sudden upon Pateoli, a Sea-towne of Campania; about which he fpent three dayes in vaine, hoping to have wonne it. The garrison in Putcoli was fixe thousand strong : and did their duty so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good fuccesse, could onely shew his anger upon the fields there, and about Naples; which having done, and once more (with as ill successe as before) assayed Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein he had very great intelligence. Whilest hee was in his progresse thither; Hanno made a journey against Beneventum : and T. Gracchus, the last yeares Conful, hasting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a battell. Hanno had with him about seventeen thoufand foot, Brutians & Lucans for the most part : besides twelve hundred horse; very sew of which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Moores. He held the Roman worke four houres, ere it could be perceived to which fide the victory would incline. But Gracchus his fouldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late-armed flaves, had received from to their Generalla peremptory denunciation, That this day or never they must purchase their liberty, bringing every man for price thereof, an enemies head. The fweet reward of liberty was fo greatly defired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it: howbeit that vaine labour, imposed by their Generall, of cutting off the staine enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindred the fervice by imployment of so many hands. ma worke to little concerning the victory. Gracehus therefore finding his owne errour. wisely corrected it: proclaiming aloud, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all should have liberty immediately after the battell, if they wonne the day. This encouragement made them runne headlong upon the Enemie; whom their desperate surie had soone overthrowne, if the Roman Horse could have made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanne did what he could, and pressed so hard upon the Romans battell, that source thousand of the flaves, (for feare either of him, or of the punishment which Gracebus had threatned before the battell, unto those that should not valiantly behave themselves) retired unto a ground of strength; yet was he glad at length to fave himselfe by flight, when the Groffe othis Armie was broken; being unable to remedy the losse. Leaving the field, he was accompanied by no more than two thousand: most of which were horse; all the rest Were either flaine or taken. The Roman Generall gave unto all his fouldiers that reward of liberty which he had promifed: but unto those foure thousand, which had recoyled unto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they served in the wars, they should neither eat nor drink otherwise than standing, unlesse sicknesses forced them to breake his order. So the victorious Armie returned to Beneventum: where the newly enfranchised Souldiers were feasted in publike by the towns-men; some sitting, some standing, and all of them having their heads covered (as was the custome of slaves manufied) with caps of white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthy of rememberance) was afterward hung up in a Tableby Gracchm, in the Temple of Liberty; which brance) was afterward hung up in a Tableby Gracchm, in the Temple of Liberty; which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeed the first bartell, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the comming of Hannibal into Italie: the victories of Marcellm at Nola, and of this Gracchm before at Hama, being things of smalliming.

Thus the Romans through industry, by little and little, repaired that great Breach in portance. their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Canna. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasurie was sopoore, that no industrie nor art could serve to helpe it. The fruits of their grounds did onely (and perhaps hardly) ferve to feed their Townes and Armies, without any furplusage, that might be exchanged for other needfull commodities. Few they were in Italy that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worse doe than before; as living upon the same trade, and subject to the same inconveniences, which enfeebled Rome it selfe. Siciland Sardinia, that were wont to yeeld great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Provinces, to hold them 20 fafe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them fuffered his part of the detriment, which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now doe least for his Countrey, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; fo as if money should be raised upon them by the Poll, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently confidering the greatnesse of the warre within the bowels of Italie, that could not bee thence expelled, without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carrhaginians, and of many among the Naturals declining from the friendship or subje-Ction of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, ready to land in the Easterne parts of Italie, if they were not at the cost to finde him work at home; the greater threats of Asaru-30 bal, to follow his brother over the Alpes, as foon as he could rid himselfe of the Scipio's in Spaine; and the povertie of the common-wealth, which had not mony for any one of these mortall dangers; were driven almost even to extreme want of counsell. But being urged by the violence of swift necessitie, signified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spaine; they resolved upon the only course, without the which the Citie could not have

They called the people to affembly ; wherein Quintus Fulvius the Prætor layd open the publike wants; and plainely faid, That in this exigent, theremust be no taking of money for victuall, weapons, apparrell, or the like things needfull to the Souldiers; butthat such as had stuffe, or were Artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with49 the Loane of their commodities and labours, untill the warre were ended. Hereunto he fo effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had lived upon their dealing in the common Revenues, that the charge was undertaken by private men; and the Armie in Spaine as well supplied, as if the Treasurie had beene full. Shortly after this, Marcus Atilius Regulus, and Publicus Forius Philm, the Roman Cenfors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Citie, were chiefly intentive to the correction of those, that had missehaved themselves in this present warre. They began with L. Cecilius Metellus; who, after the battellat Canna, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about slying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italie, had beene no better than loft. After him, they tookein hand those, that having brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Canna, returned not backe to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselves thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once backe into his Campe; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captives names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Cenfors: as also were a great many more; even who foever had not ferved in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes appointed: Neither was the note of the Cenfors at this time (as otherwise it had used to be) hurtfull onely in reputation: but greater weight was added thereunto, by this Decree of the Senate, following; That all fuch as were noted with infamy by these Censors, should bee transported into Sicil, there to serve untill the end of the Warre, under the same hard conditions, that were imposed upon the Remainder of the Armie beaten at Canne. The office of the Cenfors was, to take the Lift and accompt of the Citizens; to choose or displace the Senatours; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) upon those, whose unhonest or unseemly behaviour fell not within the compasse of the Law. They tooke also an account of the Koman Gentlemen : amongst whom they distributed the publike Horses of service, unto such as they thought meet; or tooke them away for their mif-behaviour. Generally, they had the over-fight of mens lives and manners: nand their censure was much reverenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of ranke; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasurie, from which others were exempted. But befides the care of this generall. Taxe, and matters of Moralitie, they had the charge of all publique Workes; as mending of High-wayes, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man incroached upon the Streets, High-wayes, or other places that ought to bee common; the Cenfors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customes, and other publique Revenues to farme: fo that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding unto this Office; as maintaining themselves by o some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small helpe to conserve the dignity of the Senate: the commonalty being obnoxious unto the Cenfors; which were alwayes of that Order, and carefull to up-hold the reputation thereof. But the Commonweale being now impoverished by Warre, and having small store of Lands to let, or of customes that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themselves much with perufing the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations: or if they took a view of what was requifite to be done in this kinde; yet forbore they to fet any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generofity of the Romans. They that had been accustomed in more happy times, to undertake fuch pieces of worke, offered now themselves as willingly to the Cen-30 fors, as if there had beene no fuch want: promifing liberally their coft and travell; without expectation of any payment, before the end of the Warre. In like fort, the Masters of those slaves, that lately had been infranchised by Gracehus, were very well contented to for beare the price of them, untill the Citie were inbetter case to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieve, as farre forth as every one was able, the common necessity; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widowes living under Patronage, were brought into the Treasurie; and there the Questor kept a Booke of all that was layd out for the sustenance of these Widowes and Orphans: whilest the whole stocke was used by the Citie. This good example of those which remained in the Towne, prevailed with the Souldiers abroad: fo that (the poorer fort excepted) they refused to take opay; and called those Mercenaries, that did accept it, when their Countrey was in so

The twelve hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yeelded halfe fo much commodity, as might be laid in ballance against these miseries, whereinto their Estate was now reduced. Neverthelesse if we consider things aright, the calamities of this Warre did rather enable Rome to deale with those Enemies, whom she forthwith under-tooke, than abate or flacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto she attained, ere the youngest of those men was dead, whose names we have already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman metall grew more hard and folide: and by paring the branches of private fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Commonwealth was corroborated. So grew the Citie of Athens, when Xerxes had burnt the Towne to ashes, and taken from every particular Citizen, all hope of other felicity, than that which rested in the common happinesse of the universality. Certaine it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath judiciously observed) That a State, whose demention or stemme is small, may aprly serve to be foundation of a great Monarchie: which chiefly comesto passe, where all regard of domesticall prosperity is laid aside; and every mans care addressed to the benefit of his Countrey. Hereof I might say that our Age hath feen a great example, in the united Provinces in the Netherlands; whose present riches, and strength grew chiefly from that ill affurance, which each of their Towns, or almost of their Families, perceived it selfe to hold, whilest the generality was oppressed by the Or their ranning, percent for that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme Duke of Alva; were it for that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme industry, and straining themselves to fill their publike Treasurie, they are all growne wealthy, strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their services by Land. When fore if we value at such a rate as we ought, the patient resolution, conformitie to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and above all other, the great love of the Common-Weale, which was found in Rome in the fe dangerous times: we may truely fay, That the Citie wasnever in greater likelihood to prosper. Neither can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had la- 10 sted, when their Empire, being growne more large and beautifull, should in all reason have beene more deare unto them; if the riches and delicacies of Afia had not infe-Cted them with sensualitie, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to confift; if all the Citizens and Subjects of Rome could have beleeved their owne interest to be as great, in those warres which these latter Emperours made fortheir defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded upon fo great vertue, could not have been throwne down by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they never fo many. But unto all Dominions God hath fet their periods: Who though he hath given unto Manthe knowledge of those waies, by which Kingdomes rise and fall; yet hath left him subject unto the affections, which draw on 22 thele fatall changes, in their times appointed.

6. XIIII. The Romans winne some Townes backe from Hannibal. Hannibal winnes Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two victories of Hannibal. The journey of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

S the people of Rome strained themselves to the utmost, for maintaining the Warre: fo their Generals abroad omitted no part of industry, in feeking to recover what had been loft. The Towns of Cafiline, Fabius befreged. It was well 30 defended by the Carthaginian garrison; and likely to have beene relieved by thoseof Capua, if Marcellus from Nola, had not come to the affiltance of his Colleague. Neverthelesse, the place held out so obstinatly, that Fabius was purposed to give it over: faying, that the enterprise was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. Hee faid, That many fuch things, as were not at first to have been under-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, unto be profequited to the best effect. So the siege held on and the Town was preffed so hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew fearefull, and craved parlee; offering to give it up, so as all might have leave to depart in safety, whither they pleased. Whilest they were thus treating of conditions: or whilest 40 they were issuing forth, according to the composition already made; (for it is diversly reported) Marcellus seizing upon a Gate, entred with his Armie, and put all to sword that came in their way. Fiftie of those that were first gotten out, ran to Fabius the Conful, who faved them, and fent them to Capus in fafety; all the rest were either slaine, or made prisoners. If Fabius deserved Commendations, by holding his word good unto these fifty; I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such as escaped the heat of execution, could be excused by Marcellas. It may be that he helped himselfe, after the Roman fashion, with some æquivocation, but hee shall pay forit hereafter. In like fort was Mount Marfam in Gascoigne taken by the Marshall Monlac, when I was a young man in France. For whilest he entertained parlee about compositions on; the belieged ranne all from their severall guards, upon hasty defire of being acquainted with the conditions proposed. The Marshall therefore discovering a part of the Wals unguarded, entred by Scalado, and put all fave the Governour unto the fword. Herein that Governour of Mount Marsam committed two groffe errours; the one, in that hee gave no order for the Captaines and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee without Pledges for affurance given and received. Some such over-sight the Governour of Cassline seemeth to have committed; yet neither the advantage taken by Marcellus, or by Monluc, was very honor rable. When this Work was ended, many finall Towns of the Samnites, and some of the Lucans and Apulians, were recovered: wherein were taken, or flaine, about five and twenty thousand of the Enemies; and the Country grievously wasted by Fabius, Marcellus lying fick at Nola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Tarentum; waiting to heare from those, that had promifed to give up the Towne. But M. Valerius the Roman Propretor had thrust fo many men into it, that the Traytors durft not stirre. Wherefore the Carthaginian vvas faine to depart, having vvearied himselfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he weasted not the Countrey, but contented himselfe with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: which hee chose for his win-10 tring place; and began to victuall it when Summer was but halfe paft. It is faid, that he was in love with a young Wench in that Town, in which regard if he began his winter more timely than otherwise he required, He did not like the Romans; whom necessity inforced, to make their Summer last as long as they were able to travell up and downe the Country.

About this time began great troubles in Sicil, whither Marcellus the Conful was fent, to take such order for the Province, as need should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Confulship, we will speake hereafter.

The new Consuls, chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the sonne of the present Consul, and T. Sempronius Gracehus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publique service to imploy oftentimes their best able men: and therefore made it lawfull, during the warre, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such, as had lately held their places before; vvithout regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lievtenant unto his fonne: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne unto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the Campe, and his sonne rode forth to meet him: eleven of the twelve Lictors, which carried an axe with a bundle of rods before the Conful, fuffered him, in regard of due reverence, to passe by them on horse-back, which was against the custome. But the fonne perceiving this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Conful on his feet. The father chearfully did so faying, It was my minde, sonne, to make tryall, whether thou diddest understand thy selfe to bee Conful. Cassius Altinius a wealthy Citizen of Arpi, who, after the battell at Canne, had holpen the Carthaginian into that Town, feeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came privily to this Conful Fabius, and offered to render it backe unto him. if he might be therefore well rewarded. The Conful purposed to follow old examples: and to make this Alinius a patterne to all traytors; using him as Camillus and Fabricius had done those that offered their faithfull service against the Falisei, and King Pyrthus. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and faid, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to revolt from the Roo mans, than to turne unto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that hee should be sent to the Towne of Cales, and there kept as prisoner; until they could better resolve, what to doe with him, or what use to make of him. Hannibal understanding that Altinius was gone, and among the Romans, took it not forrowfully; but thought this a good occasion to seize upon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet that he might seeme rather severe, than coverous, he sent for the wife and children of Altinius into his camp: where having examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the treason, to be burnt alive; and tooke all their goods unto himselfe. Fabius the Consul shortly after came to Arpi: which he wonne by Scalado, in a stormy and rainy night. Five thousand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the town; and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were thrust formost by the Carthaginian Garrison; when it was understood, that the Romans had gotten over the Wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Souldiers held the towns-men suspected; and therefore thought it no wisdome to trust them at their backs. But after some little resistance, the Arpines gave over fight, and entertained parley with the Romans: protesting, that they had been betrayed by their Princes; and were become subject to the Carthaginians, against their wils. In processe of this discourse, the Arpine Pretor went unto the Roman Conful: and receiving his faith for fecurity of the Town; presently presently made head against the garrison. This notwithstanding, like it is that Hannibals men continued to make good refistance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leave their companions, and serve on the Roman side, it was ver covenanted, That the Carthaginians should be suffered to passe forth quietly, and returne to Hannibal. This was performed : and fo Arpi became Reman againe, with little other loffe, than of him that had betrayed it. About the same time Chternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Pretors : and unto Cneus Fulvius, another of the Pretors, an hundred & twelve Gentlemen of Capua offered their service; upon no other condition, than to have their goods restored unto them, when their City should be recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the generall ha- to tred of the Campans towards Rome, it served to discover the inclination of the Italians inthose times; and how their affections recoyled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had been promised from Carthage. The Consentines also, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, which had yeelded them-Telves to Hannibal, returned againe to their old allegiance. Others would have followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himfelfa Captaine, and gotten reputation by some petty exploits in forraging that Country. was slaine by Hanno; with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibalin the meane while had all his care bent upon Tarentum, which if he could take, it feemed that it would frand him in good flead, for drawing over that helpe out of Macedon, 20 which his Carthaginians failed to fend. Long he waited, ere he could bring his defire to passe: and being loth to hazzard his forces, where he hoped to prevaile by intelligence: He contented himselfe with taking in some poore Townes of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found meanes to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracie, who lay at Rome as Embassadour, practising with the Hostages of the Tarentines, and such as had the keeping of them, conveighed them by night out of the Citie. But hee and his company the next day were so closely purfued, that all of them were taken, and brought backe to Rome, where they suffered death astraytors. By reason of this cruelty, or severity, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, 30 they followed their business the more diligently; as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discovered. Wherefore they sent agains to Hannibal: and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nice and Philomenes, two the chiefe among them, used much to goe forth of the Towne on hunting by night; as if they durft not take their pleasure by day, for fear of the Carthaginians. Seldome or never they missed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it ready for their hands, that they might not seeme to have been abroad upon other occasion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three dayes journy to Tarentum, if he should have marched thither with his whole Army. This caused his long abode in one place 40 the leffe to be suspected: as also to make his enemies the more secure. Hee caused it to be given out, that he was ficke. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were growne carelesse of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their businesse in order; He tooke with him ten thousand the most expedite of his horse and foot; and long before breake of day, made all speed thitherward. Fourescore light horse of the Numidians ran a great way before him, beating all the wayes, and killing any that they met, for feare left he, and his troupe following him, should be discovered. It had beene often the manner of some sew Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Governour, when he heard tell in the evening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a figne, that Hannibal was not as yet diflodged; and gave so erder, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to strip them of their boory, and fend them gone. But when it grew darke night; Hannibal guided by Philomemes, came close to the towne: where, according to the tokens agreed upon, making a light to shew his arrivall; Nice, that was within the Town, answered him with another light, in figure that he was ready. Presently Nico beganne to set upon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philomenes went toward another Gate: and whiftling (as was his maner) called up the Porter; bidding him make hafte, for that he had killed a great Bore, so heavie, that scarce two men could stand under it. So the Porter opened the wicket: and forthwith entred two young men, loaden with the Bore; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worthy the looking on. While the Porter stood wondring at the largenesse of the beast, Philomenes ran him through with his Bore-speare: and letting in some thirty armed men, fell upon all the Watch; whom when he had slaine, he entred the great gate. So the Armie of Hannibal entring Tarentum at two Gates, went directly toward the Market place, where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and fent into all quarters of the City, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans, and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof, Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends apn peared in fight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheare. All the Towne was in an uproare: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was unskilfully founded by a Greek in the Theater: which helped the fuspicion, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoyle the Towne; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadell, that stood in the mouth of the Haven; whence he might easily perceive the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal assembling the Tarentines, gave them to understand, what good affection he bore them; inveighed birterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors; and spake what else he thought fit for the prefent. This done, and having gotten fuch spoyle as was to be had of the Souldiers goods in the Towne, he addressed himselfe against the Citadell; hoping that if the Garrison would fally out, he might give them fuch a blow, as should make them unable to defend the Piece. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when he began to make his approaches, the Romans in a bravery fallying forth, gave charge upon his men: who fell backe of purpose according to direction, till they had drawne on as many as they could. and so farre from their strength, as they durst adventure. Then gave Hannibal a figneto his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpose: and fiercely setting upon the Enemy, drave him backe with great flaughter, as fast as he could runne; so that afterwards he durst not iffue forth. The Citadell stood upon a Demi-Iland, that was plaine ground; and fortified onely with a Ditch and Wall against the Towne, whereunto it was joyned by a cawfey. This cawfey Hannibal intended to fortifie in like fort against the Citadell; to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his helpe, to keep themfelyes from all danger thence. His worke in few dayes went fo well forward, without impediment from the befreged, that he conceived hope of winning the Piece it felfe, by taking a little more pains. Wherefore he made ready all forts of engines, to force the place. But whilft he was busied in his works, there came by sea a strong supply from Metipontum: which took away all hope of prevailing; and made him returne to his former counsell. Now for a finuch as the Tarentine fleet lay within the haven, and could not passe forth, whileft the Romans held the Citadell: it feemed likely that the Towne would fuffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea: whilest the Roman garrison by help of their shipping, might easily be relieved, and enabled to hold out. Against this inconvenience, is was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the haven; to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all fupply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done : for that their Town flanding in plain ground, and their streets being faire and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies over land, and lanch them into the fea without. This he undertook, and effected: whereby the Roman garrifon was reduced into great necessity; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal Often-times otherwise busied, than bis affaires required.

Thus with mutuall losse on both sides, the time passed: and the Roman forces, growing daily stronger, 2. Fulvius Flaccus. with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great Citie of Capua. Three and twenty Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hastie growth from that want of men, and of all necessaries, whereinto the losse at Canna had reduced them. But to fill up these Legions, they were faine to take up young Boyes, that were under seventeen yeares of age: and to send Commissioners above sifty miles round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might appeare serviceable, and pressing them to the Wars; making yet a Law, That their years of service, whereinto they were bound by order of the Citie, should be reckoned, for their benesit, from this their beginning so young, as if they had been of lawfull age.

Before the Roman Army drew neare, the Campans felt great want of victuall, as if they had already beene befieged. This happened partly by floth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoyle, which the Romans had in fore-going yeares made upon their grounds. They fent therefore Embassadors to Hannibal 3 desiring him to succour them ere they were closed up, as they feared to be shortly. Hee gave them comfortable words, and fent Hanno with an Army to supply their wants. Hanno appointed thema day; against which they should be ready with all maner of carriages, to store themselves with victuals, that he would provide. Neither did he promise more than he performed. For he caused great quantity of graine, that had beene laid up in Cities round about to be brought into his Campe, three miles from Beneventum. Thither at the time to appointed, came no more than forty Carts or Wagons, with a few packe-horses, asif this had beene enough to victual Capua. Such was the retchlesnesse of the Campans. Hanne was exceeding angry hereat: and told them they were worfe than very beafts: fince hunger could not teach them to have greater care. Wherefore he gave them a longerday; against which he made provision to store them throughly. Of all these doings word was fent to the Roman Confuls, from the Citizens of Beneventum. Therefore 2. Fulvius the Conful taking with him fuch ftrength as he thought needfull for the fervice. came into Beneventum by night; where with diligence he made inquiry into the behaviour of the Enemie. He learned, that Hanno with part of his Army was gone abroad to make provisions; that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters, and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their Campe; fo that little good order was kept : all thought being set upon a great harvest. Hereupon the Consul bade his men prepare themselves to affaile the Enemies Campe: and leaving all his impediments within Beneventum, he marched thitherward fo early in the morning, that he was there with the first breake of day. By comming so unexpected, he had well neareforced the Campe on the fudden. But it was very firong, and very well defended: fothat the longer the fight continued, the leffe defire had Fulvius to lose more of his menin the attempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he faid, that it were better to goe more leifurely and substantially to worke; to fend for his fellow-Conful, with the rest of their Army; and to lye betweene Hamo: and home; that neither the Campans should depart thence, nor the Carthaginians be able to relieve them. Being thus discoursing, and about to sound the retrait; he saw that fome of his men had gotten over the Enemies Rampart. There was great bootie; or (which was all one to the Souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Campe. Wherefore some Ensigne-bearers threw their Ensignes over the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, unlesse they would indure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Feare of such ignominie, than which nothing could be greater, made the Souldiers adventure so desperately; that Fulvius, perceiving the heat of his men, changed his purpose, and incouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the example of them that had already gotten over the Trenches. Thus the Campe was wonne: in which were flaine above fixe thousand; and taken above feventhousand, besides all the store of victualls, and carriages, with abundance of booty, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misadventure, and the nearer approach of both the Confuls, made them of Capua fend a pitifull Embaffage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the love that he was wont to proteft unto their Citie; and how he had made shew to affect it no lesse than Carthage. But now, they faid it would be loft, as Appi was lately, if he gave not ftrong and speedy fuccour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and sent away two thousand horse, to keep their grounds from spoyle, whilest he himselfe was detained about Tarenram, partly by hope of winning the Citadell, partly by the disposition, which he saw in many Townes adjoyning, to yeeld unto him. Among the Hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being overtaken, suffered death for their attempt; were some of the Mesapentines, and other Cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Easterne part of Italy, which was called of old, Magna Gracia. These people took to heart the death of their hostages, and thought the punishment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapentines, as foon as the Roman garrifon was taken from them to defend the Citadd of Tarentum, made no more adoe, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thuring would havedone the like, upon the like reason, had not some Companies lyen in their Towne; which they feared that they should not be able to Master. Nevertheless, they helped themselves by cunning: inviting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were neare at hand: against whom whilest they proffered their service to Asinius the Roman Captaine, they drew him forth to sight, and recoyling from him, closed up their gates. A little formality they used in pretending seare, lest the Enemy should break in together with the Romans, in saving Asinius himselfe, and sending him away by Sea; as also in with the practice) whether they should yeeld to the Cartbaginian or no. But this disputation lasted not long: for they that had removed the chiefe impediment, easily prevailed in of the site, detained Hannibal in those quarters, whilest the Consuls fortifying Beneventum to sective their backs, addressed themselves to the siege of Capua.

Many difasters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprise. T. Sempro. nius Gracehus, a very good man of Warre, that had of late been twice Conful, was flaine, either by treachery of some Lucans, that drew him into ambush, or by some Carthagia nian stragglers, among whom he fell unawares. His body, or his head, was very honourably interred either by Hannibal himself, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans : to whom Hannibal sent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneventum, there to secure the backe of the Army that should be fiege Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time, to the 20 great hinderance of that businesse. The Volones or Slaves lately manumised for sooke their Enfignes, and went every one whither he thought good, as if they had been discharged by the decease of their Leader; so that it asked some labour to seeke them out, and bring them back into their Camp. Nevertheleffe, the Confuls went forward with their work, & drawing neare to Capua, did all acts of hostility which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua gave them an hard welcome, wherein above fifteen hundred Romans were loft. Neither was it long ere Hannibal came thither, who fought with the Confuls, and had the better; infomuch, that he caused them to dislodge. They removed by night, and went severall wayes: Fulvius towards Canna, Claudius into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius, who having led him a great walk, fetcht a com-, passe about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one Marcus Centenius Penula, a from man, & one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not far from thence, where Hannibal rested, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vaunts to the Roman Senate, of vyonders which he would work if he might be trufted with the leading of five thousand men. The Fathers were unwilling in fuch a time, to reject the vertue of any good Souldier. how meane foever his condition were. Wherefore they gave him the charge of eight thousand: and hee himselfebeing a proper man, and talking bravely, gathered up so many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gave proofe of the difference betweene a front Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. He and his fellowes vvere all (in a manner) flaine, scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soon after this, Hannibal had word, that Cnew Fulvius a Roman Pretor with eighteen thousand men was in Apulia, very carelesse, and a man insufficient for the charge which he held. Thither therefore hee hasted to visit him: hoping to deale the better with the maine strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he should have cut off those forces, that lay in the Provinces about, under men of small ability. Comming upon Fulvius, he found him and his men so jolly, that needs they would have fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following .So he bestowed Mago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambush. Then offering battell to Fulvius, he soone had him in the trap: whence hemade him glad to escape alive; leaving all, save two thousand of his followers, dead

These two great blowes, received the one presently after the other, much astonished the Romans. Neverthelesse, all care was taken, to gather up the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Consuls should goe substantially forwards with the siege of Capua: which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls sate downe before the Town, and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Pretors, came with his Army from Suessula, to their assistance. They made Proclamation, That who soever would issue out of Capua before a certain day presized, should have his pardon, and be suffered to enjoy all that unto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously rejected; the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the succours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was closed up, they fent messengers to the Carthaginian; which found him at Brundusium. He had made along journy, in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadell: of which expectation failing, he turned to Brundusium, upon advertisement that he should belet in. There the Capuans met him, told him of their danger with earnest words; and were with words as bravely re-comforted. He bade them confider, how a few daies fince he had chased the Consuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would presently come thither againe, and fend the Romans going as fast as before. With this good answer to the Messengers returned, and hardly could get back into the City; which the Romans had almost intrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe, he was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily devoted unto his friend ship, would hold out a long time. and thereby give him leifure to do what he thought requifite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italy; whilest the Roman Army spent it selfe in a tedious siege. Thus he lingred, and thereby gave the Consuls time, both to fortifie themselves at Capua. and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whilest he himselfe pursued hopes that never found successe. Claudius and Fulvius, when their terme of office was expired, were appointed to continue the fiege at Capua; retaining the fame Armies as Proconfuls. The Townf-men of- 20 tenfallied out; rather in abravery, than likelihood to worke any matter of effect; the Enemy lying close within his Trenches, as intending without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan horse (for their foot was easily beaten) the Romans used to thrust out some troupes, that should hold them skirmish. In these exercifes the Campans usually had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemy; who fcorned to take foile at the hands of fuch Rebels. It was therefore devised, that some a-Ctive and couragious young men should learne to ride behind the Roman men at armes; leaping up, and againe difmounting lightly, as occasion served. These were furnished like the Velites, having each of them three or foure fmall darts: which, alighting intime of conflict, they discharged thick upon the Enemies horse; whom vanquishing in this 20 kinde of fervice, they much disheartned in the maine. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the City, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell upon their Camp. At the same time the Capuans iffued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could devise: setting all their multitude of unserviceable people on the walls, which with aloud noyse of Pans and Basons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himself to the Campans, easily defended his Trenches against them; and so well repressed them, that he drave them at length backinto their City. Neverthelesse, in purfuing them to their gates, He received a wound that accompanied him in short space after to his grave. 2. Fulvius was held harder to his taskeby Hannibal, and the Cartha- 40 ginian Army. The Roman camp was even at point to have bin loft; and Hannibal his E-Tephants, of which he brought three and thirty, were either gotten within the rampart, or elle(for the report varies) being some of them flain upon it, fell into the ditch; & filled it up in such fort, that their bodies served as a bridge unto the Assailants. It is said, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitives that could speak Latine well, to proclaim aloud as it were in the Consuls name, That every one of the Souldiers should shift for himself, and flie betimes unto the next hils, for a finuch as the Campe was already lost. But all would not serve. The fraud was detected: and the Army having sitten there so long, had at good leifure strongly intrenched it selfe, so as little hope there was to raise the siegeby force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) with-held him from taking Rome it selfe: and now his defire of winning the Tarentine Citadell, had well-near lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor the City of Tarentum were to have bin much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater use: on the sudden he enterained an haughty resolution, evento fet upon Rome; and carry to the Walles of that proud City, the danger of Warre that threatned Capua. This he thought would be a meane, to draw the Roman Generals, or one of them at least, unto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Army, then had he his defire : If they divided their forces, then was it likely, that either he or the Campans, should well enough deale with them apart. Neither did he despaire, that the terror of his coming might so astonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the City. His onely feare was, lest the Campans, being ignorant of his purpose, should thinke he had for saken them; and thereupon forthwith yeeld themselves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, he sent letters to Capua by a fubtle Numidian : who running as a fugitive into the Roman Camp, conveighed himselfe thence over the innermost Trenches into the Citie. The journey to Rome was to be performed with great celerity: no small hope of good successe resting 10 in the suddennesse of his arrivall there. Wherefore he caused his men, to have it a readinesse ten dayes victualls; and prepared as many boates, as might in one night transport his Army over the River Vuleurous. This could not be done fo closely, but that the Reman Generals, by some fugitives, had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate; which was therewith affected, according to the diverfity of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gave counsell to let alone Capua, yea, and all places else, rather than to put the Town of Rome into perill of being taken by the enemy. Others were fo farre from allowing of this, as they wondred how any man could think, that Hannibal, being unable to relieve Capua, should judge himselfe strong enough to win Rome; and therefore stoutly said, That those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the City, would ferve the turn well enough to keep him out and fend him thence, if he were so unwise as to come thicher. But it was finally concluded, that Letters should be sent to Fulvius & Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, fince they knew best what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to judge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred unto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to doe as they thought behoovefull: and if it might conveniently be, neither to raife their fiege, nor yet to put the City of Rome into much adventure. According to this Decree of the Senate, 2. Falvius took fifteen thousand foot, and a thousand horse, the choice of his whole Ar-10 my: with which he hasted roward Rome; leaving App. Clauding, who could not travell by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua.

Hannibal having passed over Vulturnus, burnt up all his boates; and left nothing that might transport the Enemy, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then hasted he away toward Rome, staying no longer in any one place, than he needs must. Yet found he the Bridges over Liris broken downe by the people of Fregelle: which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grievously to spoyle their lands, whiles the Bridges were in mending. The nearer that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made : his Namidians running before him; driving the Country, and killing or taking multitudes of all forts and ages, that fled out of all parts round a-

to bout. The messengers of these newes came apace, one after another into the City; some few bringing true advertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their owne feare. All the streets and Temples in Rome were pestered with women, crying, and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could doe none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Affembly; ready to give their advice, if it were asked, or to take directions given by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being uncertaine, upon which part Hannibal would fall. In the midst of this trepidation, there came newes that Quintus Fulvius, with part of the Army from Capua, was hasting to the defence of the City. The Office of a Proconful did expire, at his returne home, and entry into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fulvius might lose nothing by comming into the City in time of such need, an Act was passed, That hee should have equall power with the Consuls duing his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one soone after another: Fulvius having been long held occupied in passing over Vulturnus; and Hannibal receiving impediment in his journey, as much as the Countrey was able to give. The Confuls, and Fulvises, incamped without the Gates of Rome, attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew nearer and greater; fo took they more carefull and especiall order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the River Anie or Anien, three miles from the Towne; whence he advanced with two thousand horse, and rode along a great way under the Walles, viewing the fite thereof, and confidering how he might best approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story sith) was driven away, without doing or receiving any hurt. Many tumults rofe in this while among the people; but were suppressed by care and diligence of the Senators. Above the rest one accident was both troublesome, and not without perill. Of Numidians that had shifted side, and sallen (upon some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some twelve hundred then in Rome: which were appointed by the Confuls, to paffe through the Towne, from the Mount Aventure, to the Gate Collina, where it was thought that their service might be usefull, among broken wayes, and Garden walls lying in the suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed to not from the followers of Hannehal; bred fuch mistaking, as caused a great uproare among the people: all crying out that Aventine was taken, and the Enemy gotten within the Walls. The noy fe was fuch, that men could not be informed of the truth : and the ftreets were so full of cattell, and husbandmen, which were sted thither out of the Villages adjoyning, that the passage was stopt up : and the poore Numidians pitifully beaten from the house toppes, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, he the desperate multitude, that would have run out at the Gates, had it not beene certaine who lay under the Walles. To remedy the like inconveniences, it was ordained, That all which had beene Dittators, Comfals, or Confors, Should have anthority as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following Hannibal passed over Anien, and presented bat-20 tell to the Romans, who did not wifely if they undertooke it. It is faid, that a terrible showre of raine, caused both Romans and Carthaginians to returne into their severall Camps : and that this happened two dayes together, the weather breaking up and clearing as foon at they were departed afunder : certain it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten dayes provision, could not indure to stay there, until his victuals were all spent. In which regard the Romans, if they suffered him to waste his time and provisions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well advised men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (asis faid) by fome, accident of weather, the commendations must be given to their fortune. The terror of Hannibals comming to the City, how great foever it was at the first, 10 vet after some leisure, and better notice taken of their forces, which appeared lessethan the first apprention had formed them, was much and soone abated. Hereunto it helped well, that at the same time the supply appointed for Spaine, after the death of the two Scipie's, was fent out of the Town, & went forth at the gate, whilft one Carthaginian lay before another. In all Punick terrours, as they are called, whereof there is either no cause known or no cause answerable to the greatnesse of the sudden consternation; it is a good remedy to do somewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it fuch as men have fashioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his fouldiers to difarme themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great feare of they wish not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a foolish uproare in his Army, by proclai- 40 ming a reward unto him that could tell who had fent the Affe into the Camp. But in this present example of the Ramans, appears withall a great magnanimity: whereby they sustained their reputation, and augmented it no leffe, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seeme to have been diminished. Neither could they more finely have checked the glorious conceits of their enemies, and taken away the differace of that feare, which clouded their valour at his first comings than by making such demonstrations, whenonce they had recovered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that very piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay encamped, was folde in Rome: and fold it was nothing under the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had bin in time of peace. This indignity comming to his eare, incenfed Hannibal fo much, that he made so port-sale of the Silver-smiths shoppes, which were neare about the Market or Common place in Rome, as if his owne title to the houses within the Towne were no whit worke, than any Roman Citizens could be unto that piece of ground, whereon heraifed his Tent. But this counter-practife was nothing worth. The Romans did feek to manifest that assurance which they justly had conceived; Hannibal, to make shew of contiswing in an hope, which was already past. His victuals were almost spent : and of those ends, that he had proposed unto himselfe, this journy had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore hee brake up his Campe: and doing what spoile he could of the Roman Territory, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, he passed like a tempest over the Country, and ran toward the Easterne Sea so fast, that he had almost taken the Citie of Rhegium before his arrivall was feared or suspected. As for Capua, he gave it lost : and is likely to have cursed the whole faction of Hanno, which thus disabled him to relieve that faire City, since he had no other way to vent his griefe.

2. Fulvius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that whoso vvould yeeld, before a certaine day, might fafely doe it. This, and the very returne of Fulvius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gave the Capuans to understand, that they to vvere abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaimed, every mans conscience of his owne evill deserts, told him, that it was a vanity: and some faint hope was given, by Hanno and Bostar, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Towne, that Hannibal should come againe; if meanes could onely be found, how to convey such Letters unto him as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was undertaken by some Numidians: who running as fugitives, out of the Towne into the Roman Camp, waited fit opportunity to make an escape thence with their packets. But it hapned ere they could conveigh themselves away, that one of them was detected by an harlot following him out of the Town; and the Letters of Bostar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement intreaty unto Hannibal, that hee would not thus for sake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make Warre against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions, wheresoever they lye, there also should the Carthaginian Army be ready to attend them; and by taking of such courfe, have we gotten those victories at Trebia, Thrsjamene, and Canna. In fine, they befought him, that he would not dishonour himselfe, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another way; as if it were his onely care, that the Citie should not be taken in his full view: promising to make a desperate sally, if he would once more adventure to fet upon the Roman Campe. Such were the hopes of Boltar and his fellow.

But Hannibal had already done his best: and now beganne to faint under the bur-30 den of that Warre, wherein (as afterward he protested) he was vanquished by Han-Liv. 186-30no and his Partifans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well bee, as athing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had bin fent over by the Hannonians, to observe the doings of Hannibal, and to checke his proceedings. If this were fo, justly might they curfe their owne malice, which had cast them into this remedilessenecessity. Howsoever it were, the Letters directed unto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconfuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all fuch counterfeit fugitives, as carried fuch meffages, whipt them back into the Towne. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Eumpans, so that the multitude crying out upon the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to affemble and confult, about the yeelding up of Capua unto the Romans. The bravest of the Senators, and fuch as a few years fince, had beene most forward in joyning with Hannibal, understood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drinke to them fuch an health, as should set them free from that cruell revenge, which the Enemies fought upon their bodies. About seven and twenty of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their lives together, by drinking poyfor. All the rest hoping for more mercy than they had deserved, yeelded simply to discretion. So one of the Town-gates was set open; whereat a Roman Legion, with some other Companies, entring, difarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Car-Othaginian Garrison; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman camp. At their comming thither, the Proconfuls laid yrons upon them all, and commanding them rottell what store of gold and silver they had at home, sent them into safe custodie; fome to Cales, others to Theanum. Touching the generall multitude, they were referved unto the discretion of the Senate: yet so hardly used by Fulvius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this adversity. Ap. Claudius was brought even to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received: yet was he not inexorable to the Campans; as having loved them well in former times, & having given his daughter in mariage to that Pacavins, of whom we spake before. But this facility of his Colleague, made Fulvius the more hasty in taking vengeance: for feare, left upon the like respects, the Roman Senate might prove more gentle, than he thought behoovefull to the common safety, and honour of their State. Wherefore he took the paines to ride by night unto Theanum, and from thence to Cales: where he caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which he struck off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all townes of Italy the leffe apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campans: and bred a generall inclination, to returne upon good conditions to the Roman fide. The Atellans, Ca. neral inclination, o retuine apoil so the Campans, that in the former change had followed to latines and Sabatines, people of the Campans, the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very scare and want of ability to refift. They were therefore used with the like rigour, by Falvius who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desparation. Wherefore some of their yong gentlemen, burning with fire of revenge, got into Rome: where they found means by night-time, to fet on fire so many houses, that a great part of the city was like to have bin confumed. The beginning of the fire in divers places at once, argued that it was no casualty. Wherefore liberty was proclaimed unto any slave, and other sufficient reward to any free man, that should discover who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came our; and the Campans being detected by a flave of their owne (to whom, above his liberty promifed, was given about the sum of an hundred markes) had the punishment answera-20 ble to their deferts. Fulvius hereby being more and more incenfed against this wretched people, held them in a maner as prisoners within their Walls: and this extreme severity caused them at length to become Suppliants unto the Roman Senate; that some period might be fet unto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolved in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Onely two poore women in Capua (of which one had beene an harlot) were found not guilty of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wives and children fold for slaves, and their goods confilcated; others laid in prison, and reserved to further deliberation: but the generality of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certaine day, and confined unto severall places, as best liked the angry victors. As for the towne of Capua, it was suffered to 10 ftand, in regard of the beauty and commodious fite: but no corporation or forme of politie was allowed to be therein; onely a Roman Provost vvas every year sent to governe over those that should inhabit it, and to doe justice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present war. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to shine with a more dim light than before his oyle being farre spent; and that which should have revived his slame, being unfortunately shed; as shall be told in place convenient.

6. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a party in Sardinia and Sicil, held War against the Romans 40 in those Islands, and were overcome.

Hilft things passed thus in Italy, the commotions raised in Sardinia & Sicil by the Carthaginians & their friends, were brought to a quiet & happy end by the industrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great and fudden : above thirty thousand being up in armes, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppress it. One Harsicoras with his son Hyostus, mighty men in that Iland, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promised the assistance of his country. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise so carelesse, as intherest of their maine undertakings, about the same time. Yet it had beene better if 50 their care had been directed unto the profecution of that maine businesse in Italy; whereon this and all other hopes depended. For it would have fufficed, if they could have hindred the Romans from fending an Army into Sardinia. Harficoras with his followers might well enough have served to drive out Quintus Mutius the Prætor: who lay ficke in the Province; and not more weake in his owne body, than in his traine. But vvhilest they sought revenge of that particular injurie, vvhereof the sense vvas most gricvous; they neglected the opportunity of requiting those that had done them vvrong, and of the securing themselves from all injuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprise was such, as may seeme to have encouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For whereas they sent over Astrabal, surnamed the Bald, with a competent fleet and Armie; affisted in this expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Mago a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and neere kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole fleet, by extremity of soule weather, was cast upon the Baleares; so beaten, and in such evill plight, that the Sardimans had even spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them.

Titus Manlius was fent from Rome with two and twenty thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Iland, which he had taken in, and annexed uno to the Roman dominion, long before this, in his Confulship. It was a laudable custome of the Romans, to preferve and up-hold in their feverall Provinces, the greatnesse and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Province had beene first subdued unto their Empire. If any injurie were done unto the Provincialls, if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate, or whatfoever accident required the affiftance of a Patron; the first Conquerour, and his race after him, were the most ready and best approved meanes, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very fure intelligence, in every Province, and had alwayes in readinesse fitmen to reclaime their Subjects, if they fell into any fuch diforder, as would otherwise have required a greater charge and trouble. The comming of Manlius retained in obedience all that were not already broken too farre out. Yet was Harficoras to ftrong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not have made up that number of two and twenty thousand, whereof we have spoken before: he landed at Calaris, or Carallis, where mooring his ships, he passed up into the Countrey, and fought out the Enemie. Hyoftm, the sonne of Harsicoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Army left unto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrey. to draw in more friends to their fide. This young gentleman would need adventure toget honour, by giving battell to the Romans at his owne differetion. So he rashly adventured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom hee received a terrible overthrow: o and loft in one day above thirtie thousand of his followers. Hyoft 248 himselfe, with the reft of his broken troupes, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Island: whither Manlius purfued them. Very foon after this defeature came Afdrub al with his Caribaginians, too late to winne all Sardinia in such haste as he might have done, if the tempeft had not hindered his voyage: yet foone enough, and ftrong enough to fave the Towns of Cornus, and to put a new spirit into the Rebels. Manlious hereupon withdrew himselfe backe to Calaris: where he had not stayed long, ere the Sardinians (such of them as adhered to the Roman party) craved his affiftance; their Countrey being wafted by the Caribaginians, and the Rebels, with whom they had refused to joyne. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris: where, if he had stayed a little longer, Afdrubal would have fought him out with fome blemish to his reputation. But the fame of Asdrubal and his company appeares to have bin greater than was their strength. For after some triall made of them in a few skirmishes, Marlin adventured all to the hazzard of a battell; wherein he flew twelve thousand of the enemies; and tooke of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thousand. Foure houresthe battell lasted; and victory at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Islanders, whose courages had beene broken in their unprosperous fight, nor many dayes before. The death of young Hyostem, and of his father Harficoras, that flew himfelfe for griefe, together with the captivity of Afdrabal himfelfe, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians, made the victory the more famous. The vanquished Armie fled into Cornus; whither Manlin followed them, and in shore space won the Towne. All other Cities of the Isle that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yeelded unto the Roman; who, imposing upon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best forted with the nature of their severall offences, or their ability to pay returned back to Calaris with a great booty, & from thence to Rome, leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The warre in Sicil was of greater length, and every way more burdenfome to Rome: as also the victorie brought more honour and profit, for that the Romans became thereby, not onely favers of their owne, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Countrie, by annexing the City and dominion of Syracuse; to that which they enjoyed before. Soon after the battell of Canna, the old King of Syracuse died; who had continued long a stedfast friend unto the Romans, and greatly relieved them in this present warre. He left his kingdome to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteene yeeres of age; Gelohis fonne, that should have bin his heire, being dead before. To this young King his succeffour, Hiero appointed fifteen tutors: of which the principall were Andronodorus, Zoilu, and Themistius; who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were fuch, as he judged most likely to preserve the kingdome, by the same art, whereby himselfe had gotten and so long kept it. But within a little while, Andronodorm waxing wearie of fo many coadjutors, began to commend the fufficiency of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his yeeres; and faid, that he was able to rule the king-10 dome without help of any Protector. Thus, by giving over his owne charge, he caused others to do the like: hoping thereby to get the king wholly into his hands; which came to passe, in a fort, as he desired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of government. gave himselfe wholly over to his pleasures: or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitic, it was onely in matter of exterior shew; as wearing a Diadem, with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people, that had never seene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his sonne. But much more he offended them, when by his infolent behaviour, futable to his outward pompe, he gave proofe, that in course of life, he would revive the memory of Tyrants dead long since, from whom hetooke the patterne of his habit. He grew proud, luftfull, cruell, and dangerous to all that were about him: fo that fuch of his late tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to live in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to avoid the danger of his difpleafure, that feemed worse than death it selfe. Onely Andronodorm, Zoilm, and one Thrato continued in grace with him, and were his Counfellors, but not of his Cabinet. These, howsoever they agreed in other points, were at some diffention about the maine point of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them were wholly for the Kings pleasures, which was set on change: but Thraso, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilest as yet it remained somewhat doubtfull which way the King would 20 incline, a conspiracie against his person was detected by a Groome of his; to whom one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would speake any thing: but yeelding (as it seemed) in the end, unto the extremity of the torture, he confessed, that he had beene set on by Thrafo; whom he appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were neere in love or place unto Hieronymu. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeed the Conspirators, walked boldly in the ftreets, and never shrunke for the matter: assuring themselves, that the resolution of Theodorm would yeeld to no extremitie. Thus they all 40 escaped, and soone after found meanes to execute their purpose. The King himselfe, when Thraso was taken out of the way, quickly resolved upon siding with the Caribaginians, whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when first they grow Mafters of themselves, love to seeme wiser than their fathers, by taking different courses. And the liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great necessitie, had of late been such, as might have been termed excessive, were it not in regard of his providence; wherein he tooke order for his owne Estate, that depended upon theirs. But the young Nephew taking little heed of dangers farre off, regarded onely the things prefent; the weaknesse of Rome, the prevalent fortunes of Carthage, and the much money that his grand-father had layed out in vaine, to shoulder up a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hanni- 50 bal: who readily entred into good correspondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicides, Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a banished Syracufian. These grew into such favour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they listed. So that when App. Claudius the Roman Prætor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacie, betweene the people of Rome, and the King of Syracuse; his Messengers were dismissed with an open scoffe. For Hieronymus would needs have them tell him the order of the fight at Canna, that he might thereby learne how to accommodate himselfe; saying that he could hardly believe the Carthaginians; fo wonderfull was the victory as they reported it. Having thus difinified the Romans, he fent Embaffadors to Carthage, where he concluded a league: with condition, at first, that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he should reigne over all Sicil; and the Carthaginians rest satisfied with what they could get in Italie. At these doings Apprins Claudius did not greatly stirre: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoved not the Romans to entertaine more quarrels, than were enforced upon them by necessitie; and partly (as may seeme) for that the reputation, both of himselfe, and of his Citie, had received such blemish, by that which hapned unto him in his journey, as much discountenanced him when he to came into Sicil, and forbade him to looke bigge. The money that Hiero had bestowed formerly upon the Romans, wherewith to relieve them in their necessitie, this Approx was to carry backe unto him: it being refused by the Roman Senate, with greater braverie than their present fortune would allow. But in stead of returning the money with thankes, as he had bin directed, and as it had bin noised abroad that he should doe: the warre against Philip King of Mucedon (whereof we have spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay afide their vaine glory, and fend word after him, that he should consigne that money over to Marcin Valerius; of whose voyage into Greece, the City had not otherwise wherewith to beare the charge. This was done accordingly, and hereby claudim (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious oftentation of the Roman magnanimitie, into fuch a pitifull tune of thankl giving, as must needs have bred forrow and commiseration in so true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were delivered after his death, matter of passime and scorn, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whilest Hieronymus was more desirous of war, than well resolved how to begin it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred agreat innovation in the state of Syracufe; which thereby might have prospered more than ever, had it been wisely governed. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we spake before, were sent about the Countrie with two thousand men, to follicite the Townes, and perswade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himselfe with an Armie of fifteene thoufand horse and foot, went to Leontium, a City of his owne Dominion: hoping that the 30 fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all hafte, and accept him for Soveraigne. There the Conspirators tooke him on the sudden, as he was passing through a narrow fireet: and rushing betweene him and his guard, strooke him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the found of that word fo joyfully answered by the Lebnunes, that the guard of Hieronymus had little courage to revenge their Mafters death. Yet, for feare of the worst, agreat largesse was promised unto the Souldiers, with rewards unto their Captaines; which wrought fo effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned up, the Armie, as in deteftation of his bad life, fuffered his carkaffe to lie unburied. The fenewes ranne quickly to Stracufe: whither some of the Conspirators, taking also of the Kings horses, posted away; to signific all that had passed, to stirre up the people to libertie, and to prevent Andronodorus, if he or his fellowes would make offer to usurpe a tyranny. The Syracusians hereupon prefently toooke Armes, and made themselves masters of their owne Citie. Andronadorus on the other fide fortified the Palace, and the Island; being yet uncertaine what to doe: between defire of making himselfe a soveraigne Lord, and feare of suffering punishment as a Tyrant, if his enterprise mis-carried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that wel-knowne Proverbe. which Dionyfins had used; That a Tyrant should keep elis place, till he were haled out of it by the heeles, and not ride away from it on horfe-backe. But feare, and better counfell. prevailed fo farre, that Andronodorus, having flept upon the matter, diffembled his affections, and deferred his hope unto better opportunity. The next day he came forth, and made a speech unto the people; telling them, that he was glad to see, how prudently they behaved themselves in so great a change; that he had stood in feare, left they would not have contained themselves within the bounds of discretion; but rather have fought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that, fince he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to ravish their liberry perforce, but to wed it unto them for ever; he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, and surrendred up the charge committed unto him, by one that had bin an evill mafter both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made, and Prætors chosen (asin former times) to governe the Citie, of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But fuch was his defire of Soveraigntie, and fo vehement were the instigations of his wife, that shortly he began to practise with Hippocrases, Epicides, and other Captaines of the Mercenaries; hoping to makehimfelfe strong by their helpe, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrases and Epicides had beene with the Syracusian Prætors, and told them, that being fent from Hannibalto Hieronymus, they, according to instructions of their Captaine, had done him, whilest he lived, what sevrice they could; and that now they were defirous to returne home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed; and with a convoy, that might keepe them from falling to into the hands of the Romans, and fet them fafe at Locri. This was eafily granted; both for that the Syracufian Magistrates were well contented to earne thankes of Hannibal, with fuch a little courtefie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickly of this trouble some couple, which were good souldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwise lewed men. It was not the defire of these two Sicilians, to be gone To hastily as they made shew; they were more mindfull of the businesse for which Hannibal had fent them. Wherefore they infinuated themselves into the bosomes of such as were most likely to fill the Army with tumult, especially of the Roman fugitives, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans and Syracufians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had 20 great need of: as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. He found Themistius, that had married Harmonia, the sister of Hierenymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like paffions of his owne, and of his wife. But in feeking to increase the number of his adherents, he revealed the matter to one, that revealed all to the rest of the Prætors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entring into the Senate, were slaine out of hand: and afterward accused to the People, of all the evill which they had done, whilest Hieronymus lived, as by his authoritie; and now fince attempted, in seeking to usurp the tyranny themselves. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessary to this dangerous treason: and that the unquiet spirits of these women would never cease to work, untill they had recovered those royall 30 ornaments and Soveraigne power, whereof their family was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo were also condemned to die, and executioners prefently fent by the enraged people, to take away their lives. Demarata and Harmonia had perhaps deserved this heavie sentence : but Heraclea, the daughter of Hiero, and wise of Sosippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered, together with her two young daughters, in the hastie execution of this rash judgement. Her husband Sosippus was a lover of the Common wealth; and in that respect so hated by Hieronymus, that being sent Embaffador to King Prolomie, &c. hedurst not returne home, but stayed in Egypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with some pitifull accidents accompanying the flaughter, fo affected the multitude, that (pardoning them-40 selves) all cried out upon the Authors of so soule a butcherie. Being thus incensed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satisfic their anger, they called for an election of new Prætors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately flain: meaning to fub stitute such in their places, as the Senators should have little cause to like. At the election were present a great rowt, not onely of the poorer Cirizens, but of fouldiers that preffed into the throng. One of these, named Epicides Prætor; another named Hippocrates: and the leffe that the old Prætors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generall criefored them to be accepted. These being made Prætors did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, betweene the Syracusans and the Romans. But having stri-50 ven invaine, and feeing that the people stood in feare of Ap. Claudius, and of Maycellus that was lately come into Sicil; they gave way unto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be re-confirmed, which afterward they purposed to dissolve by practise. The Leontines had some need of a garrison; and to them was sent Hippocrates the Prætor, attended by fuch fugitives, and mercenary fouldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thirher when he came, he began to doe many acts of hostility against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly & boldly. Marcellus, rightly understanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word unto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the league; and that the peace would never be kept fincerely, untill this turbulent pair of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicides, fearing to sustaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more defirous to fet forward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace; went himselfunto the Leonines, whom he perswaded to rebell against the Syraculians. For he faid, that fince they had all of late served one Master, there was little reafon why the Leonines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracusians; yea or much rather, all things confidered; fince in their streets the Tyrant was slain, and liberty first proclaimed. Wherefore, fince they of Syracuse were not contented to enjoy the freedome purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that to they should beare Dominion over those that had broken the Chaine, wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his advice was, that fuch their arrogancie should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was given by one article of the League, made of late by the Romans and Syracufians. For it was agreed, That all which had beene subject to Hiero and Hieronymus, should henceforth be Vaffals unto the State of Syracufe. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due; Epicides told them, that in this noveltie of change, they had fit opportunitie to recover the freedome, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it unreasonable, which this crafty Carthagiman propounded; if the Leontines had beene subdued by the same hand, which tooke 26 libertic from the Syracufians. But feeing they had long fince yeelded unto Syracufe, and beene subject unto that Citie, by what forme soever it was governed; this claime of libertie was rather seasonable, than just. Neverthelesse, the motion of Epicides was highly approved: infomuch that when meffengers came foone after from Syracufe, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans, and to denounce unto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they should get them gone, either to Locri, or whither else they listed, so that they stayed not in sicil: word was returned, That they of Leonium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans, nor thought themselves bound to observe the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory answer was forthwith repor-30 ted unto Marcellus by the Syracufians; who offered him their affiftance in doing justice upon the Leonines their Rebels; with condition, That when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better fatisfaction: but forth-with took the businesse in hand, which he dispatched in one day. At the first affault Leonium was taken, all fave the Castle; whereinto Hippocrates and Epicides sled: and stealing thence away by night, conveyed themselves into the towne of Herbefus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when he had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captains afed after victorie, to feek out the fugitive Roman flaves and renegado's, whom he caused all to die: the rest both of the Towns-men and Souldiers, he tooke to mercy, forbearing also to strip or spoyle them. But the same of his doings was bruited after a contrarie fort. It was faid, that he had flaine Man, Woman, and Childe, and put the Towne to facke. These newes met the Syracustan Army upon the way, as it was going to joyne with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercenaries there were, that had beene fent forth of Syracuse, under Sosis and Dinomenes, two of the Prætors, to serve against the Leontines and other rebels. These Captains were honest men, and well affected to their Countrey': but the Souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They took thematter deepely to heart, that their fellow fouldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had beene fo cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Prætors therefore thought it best, to turne their unquiet thoughts another way, and setthem a-Worke in some place else: for as much as at Leonium there was no need of their service. So towards Herbesia they marched; where lay Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischiefe, devising what further harme they might doe; but now so weakely accompanied, that they feemed unable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two brethren were no lesse well aware: and therefore adventured upon a remedy little lesse desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbestus unarmed, with Olive branches in their hands, in manner of Suppliants; and to presented themselves to the Army. Six hundred men of Creet were in the vantguard; that had beene well used by Hieronymus; an d some of them greatly bound unto Hannibal, who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and lovingly dismissed them. These Cremans therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheare, faying, That no man should doe them harme, as long as they could use their weapons. Herewithall the Army was at a stand; and the rumour of this accident ranne swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Prætors thought to help the matter by feverity, which would not ferve. For when they commanded these two traitors to be layd in Irons, the exclamation was so violent against them, that faine they were to let all alone, and returne, uncertaine what course to take, unto Megara, where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates devised a tricke, whereby to help himselfe, and better the uncertaine case wherein he stood. He caused Letters, of his owne penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trustie Cresans, directed (as they made shew) from the Syracusian Prætors to Marcellus. The contents hereof were That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the fword among the Leonines: but that it further behoved him, to make the like dispatch of all the mercenaries belonging to Syracule; which were offensive, all of them in generall, to the liberty of the City, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epistle was openly rehearsed, the uproare was such, that Sofis and his fellow Prætor, were glad to forsake the Campe, and slie for their lives. All the Syracufians remaining behinde, had beene cut in pieces by the enraged Souldiers, if the two Artificers of the fedition had not faved their lives; rather 20 to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne, than for any good will. They perfwaded also a mischievous knave, that had served amongst the Leontines, to justifie the bruit of Marcellm cruelty, and to carry home the newes to Syrasufe, as an eye-witnesse. This incensed not onely the multitude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole towne with causelesse indignation. In good time (faid some) was the avarice and cruelty of the Romans detected: who, had they in like fort gotten into Syracufe, would have dealt much worse, where their greedy apperites might have beene tempted with a farre greater bootie. Whilest they were thus discoursing, and deviling how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Army came to the gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in unleffe for want of helpe, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Prætors, with the best and wisest of the Senate, would fain have kept him out: but the violence of the fouldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-strong fury of those within the Town, that laboured to breake it open So he entred, and immediately fell upon the Prætors, whom (being forfaken by all men)he put to the sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers untill night. The next day hee went openly to worke: and, after the common example of Tyrants, gave liberty unto all flaves and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and baselft sort, made himselfe and his brother Prætors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Sy-

When Marcellus was advertised of this great alteration, he thought it no time for As him to fit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadours to Syracuse, that were not admitted into the Haven, but chased out as enemies. Then drew he neere with his Armie: and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the Town, sent before him, some torequire a parlee. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Prætors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpose to do hurt, but in favour of the Syraculians, which were oppressed by Tyrants; and to punish those that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthy men, their Consederates, which were chased out of the Towne, might be suffered to returne and enjoy their owne; as also that the Authors of the great flaughter lately committed, might be delivered up. Hereto Epicides briefly s answered, that if their errand had beene to him, he could have told what to say to them: but fince it was directed unto others, they should doe well to returne, when those to whom they were sent, had the government in their hands. As for the warre which they threatned, he told them, they should finde by experience, That to be siege Syracuse was another manner of worke, than to take Leonium. Thus hee sent them gone; and returned backe into the Citie. Immediately began the fiege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quicke and easie winning of Leonisum, did put Marcellusin hope, that folong a circuit of wals as compassed Syracuse, being manned with no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terrour in the very beginning; but did his best both by Land and Sea. Neverthelesse all his labour was disappointed; & his hope of prevailing by open force, taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the Citie, that bred such despaire of hastic victory. But there lived at that time in Syracufe, Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinfman, had framed fuch engines of Warre, as being in this extremity put in use, did more mischiese to the Ramanethan could have beene owrought by the Canon, or any inffruments of Gunne-powder; had they in that age beene knowne. This Archimedes discoursig once with Hiero, maintained that it were possible to remove the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of fure footing, whereon a man might stand. For proofe of this. bold affertion; he performed some strange workes; which made the King entreat him to convert his Rudie unto things of use: that might preserve the Citie from danger of enemies. To such Mechanicall workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an injury done unto the liberall fciences, to submit learned Propositions, unto the workemanship, and gaine, of base handi-crafts men. And of this opinion Plate was an author: who greatly blamed fome Geometricians; that feemed unto him to prophane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must we rathly taske a man fo wife Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austerity, or affeelect fingularity in his reprehension. For it hath beene the unhappy fate of great inventions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreames beforethey were published: and being once made knowne, to be under-valued; as falling within compasse of the meanest wit; and things, that every one could well have performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discoverie, with the much different forts of neglect, which he under-went before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may see most apparent proofe. He that lookes upon our Emalift Bremers, and their Servants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke it ridiculous to heare one say, that the making of Male, was an invention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in naturall Philosophic. Yet is not the skill of the inventors any whit the leffe, for that the labour of workemanship growes to be the triade of ignorant men. The like may bee faid of many handi-crafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes; which being devised, and bettered, by great Scholers and wifemen, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by fuch, as could flubber things eafily over, and feede their workemen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others that have, or would feeme to have any fecret skill, whereof the publication might doe good unto mankinde; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kinde of injustice, that the long travells of an understanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away upon men of no worth; yeeld lesse bemefit unto the Author of a great worke, than to meere strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And furely, if the paffion of Envie have in it any thing allowable and naturall, as having Anger, Feare, and other like Affections: it is in some such case as this; and lerveth against those, which would usurpe the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to indue them. Nevertheleffe, if we have regard unto common charity, and the great affection that every one ought to beare unto the generality of mankinde, after the example of him that suffereth his Summe to shine upon the just, and unjust: it will appeare more commendable in wife men, to enlarge themselves, and to publish unto the world, those good things that lye buried in their owne bosomes. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it fome dangerous cunning, that may bee perverted by evill mento a mischievous use. For if the secret of any rare Antidote, contained in it the skill of giving some deadly and irrecoverable poison: much better it were, that fuch a jewell remaine close in the hands of a wife and honest man; than being made common, binde all men to use the remedy, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischiese. But the workes which Archimedes published, were such as tended unto very commendable ends. They were Engines, serving unto the desence of Syracuse; not fit for the Syracufians to carry abroad, to the hurt & oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to use them, but reserved so much to his owne Eeeec direction:

direction; that after his death more of the fame kinde were not made, nor those of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed unto this worthy man, that he had approved unto the vulgar, the dignity of his Science; and done especiall benefit to had approved unto the vulgar, the dignity of his Science; and done especiall benefit to his Country. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade, or teach the Art of murdering men, his Country his purpose.

it was besides his purpose. Marcellus had caused certaine of his Quinquereme Gallies to be fastned together, and Towers erected on them to beat the defendants from the wal. Against these Archimedes had fundrie devices; of which any one fort might have repelled the affailants: but all of them together shewed the multiplicity of his great wit. He shot heavie stones & long pieces of timber, like unto the yeards of thips; which brake fome of the Gallies by their 10 force and weight. These afflicted such as lay farre off. They that were come neeter the wals, lay open to a continual volly of thor, which they could not endure. Some with an yron grapple were taken by the prow and hoysted up, shaking out all the men, and af. terwards falling downe into the water. Some by ftrange Engines were lifted up into the ayre, where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls or cast upon the rockes: and all of them were so beaten that they durst never come to any second assault, In the like fort was the Land armie handled. Stones and timber, falling upon it like halle, did not onely over-whelme the men, but brake downethe Roman engins of battery; and forced Marcellus to give over the affault. For remedy hereof it was conceived, that if the Romans could early before day get neere unto the walls: they should be (as it were), under the point blancke, and receive no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which were woond up hard to shoot a great compasse. But this vaine hope cost many of the affalants lives: For the shot came downe right upon them; and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great flaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were unable to tarry by it) eventill they were gotten very farre off. This did fo terrefie the Romans, that if they perceived any peece of timber, or a ropes end, upon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engines were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare, against the cause whereof he knew no remedie. If the engines had stood upon the wals, fubject to firing, or any fuch annoyance from without; he might have holpen it by 30 fome device, to make them unferviceable. But all, or the most of them were out of fight, being erected in the streetes behinde the walls , where Archimedes gave directions how to use them. Wherefore the Roman had no other way left, than to cut off from the Town all provision of victualls, both by Land and by Sea.

This was a very desperate peece of worke. For the enemies having so goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likely so some to be consumed with famine, as the besiegers to be wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a City, having no probability to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the meane while, Himileo, Admirall of a Canhaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicil, being by Happocrates advertised of these passages, went home to Caribage and there so dealt with the Senate, that five and twenty thousand Foot, three thousand there so dealt with the Senate, that five and twenty thousand Foot, three thousand there is a senate of the sen fand Horse, and twelve Elephants, were committed unto his charge, wherewith to make warre upon the Romans in Sicil by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many that had anciently belonged unto the Caribaginians, did yeeld unto him. To remedie this mischiese, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne unto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Armie, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. He tooke Pelorus and Herbesu, which yeelded unto him. He tooke also Megara by force and fackt it:5 either to terrefie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusians, or else because Rome was at this time poore, and his Army must have somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall desire was to have faved Agrigentum: whither he came too late; for Himiles had gotten it before. Therefore he returned backe toward Syracufe; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too ftrong for him. The circumspection that he used, in regard of Himileo, stood him in good stead against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracufe unto his brother, had lately iffued out of the Citie, with ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse, intending to joyne his forces with Himileo. Marcellus fell upon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being ingood order, got an easie victorie against the dispersed and halse unarmed Syracusians. The reputation hereof helped a little to keepe the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himileo, joyning with even at his Trenches; but the Island at his pleasure, and presented battaile to Marcellus, tred with a great fleet into the Haven of Syracuse, and victualled the Citic. Asterthis, the disposition of the Islanders changed so againe, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himileo, and safely arrived at Marcellus his mane Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus, leaving some of his Armie before Syracuse, that hee might not seeme to have given over the flege, went unto Leonium, where he lay intentive to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he flood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of befieging Syracufe, or to turn all his forces to Agrigenum, against Himileo and Hippocrates. But it would greatly have impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracufe, as unable to prevaile: & he himfelfe was of an eager disposition, ever unwilling to give ground, or to quit, as not feifible, an enterprise that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; & no likelihood to take the City by force or famine; yet was he not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his defire. Especially he assaicd to prevaile by treason; against which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracustan Gentlemen that were in his Campe; exhorting them to practife with their friends that remained in the City. This was not easie for them to doe, because the Towne would hearken to no parlee. At length a slave unto one of these banished men, making shew to runne away from his Master, got into Syracuse; where hee talked in private with some few, as hee had beene instructed. Thus began Marcellus to have intelligence within the City: whence the Conspirators used 30 to fend him advertisement of their procedings, by a fisher-boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were growne to the number of fourescore, and thought themfelves able to effect somewhat of importance, all was discovered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while, one Damasippus a Lacedamonian, that had been fent out of the Towne as an Embaffador to Fhilip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very defirous to ransome him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, not farre from the walls. There, one of the Romanes looking upon the wall, and wanting the more compendious Art of Geometrie, fell to numbring the stones: and, making an estimate of the height, judged it lesse than it had beene formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who causing better notice to be taken of the place; and finding, that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it; made all things ready, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakest part of the Towne, and therefore the most strongly guarded : neither was there hope to prevaile by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surprise. But a fugitive out of the Towne brought word, that a great feast was to be held unto Diana, which was to last three daies: and that , because other good cheare was not so plentifull within the Citie, as in former times, Epicides, to gratific the People, had made the more large distribution of Wine. A better opportunity could not bee wished. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the Festivall night, came unto the walls, which he took by Scalado. Syracuse was divided into soure parts (or five, if Epipola were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some perces, he had the commodity of a better and fafe lodging, with good flore of bootie; and better opportunity than before, to deale with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradinia & the Island, inner parts of the Town, as of those that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to hearken unto composition, as being much terrefied by the loffe of those parts, which the Romans had taken and fackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, unto those that were sheltred under strong houses: although it may seeme, that the inner walls were not altogether unfurnished of his helpe; fince they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitives and Renegado's, were more carefull than ever to defend the rest of the Citie: being sure to be rewarded with cruell death, if Marcellus could prevaile. Hippocrates and Himileo, were daily expected; & Bomilear was lent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himileo came: who fell upon the old Camp of the Romans, whilest Epicides sallied out of Acradinia upon Marcellus. But the Romans made such defence in each part, that the Assailants were repelled. Nevertheleffe, they continued to befet Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as streightly besieged, as he himselfe did besiege the Towne. But the pestilence at length confumed, together with the two Captains, a great part of the Armie, and caused the rest to dislodge. The Romans were (though somewhat lesse) afflicted with the same pe- 10 stilence, in so much that Bomilear did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were fent thither. This Bomilear wanted no defire to doe his Countrie service : but his courage was not answerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachynus with a strong fleet: where he staid; being loth to double the Cape; for that the windes did better serve the enemie than him. Thither sailed Epicides out of Syracuse: to acquaint him with the necessities of the Citic; and to draw him on. With much increasie, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was readie for him, he stood off into the deepe; and failed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell. Then durft not Epicides returne into Syracuse, but went to Agrigenium: where he expected the iffue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

The Sicilian Souldiers that remained alive of Happocrates his Army, lay as neere as 20 they could fafely, unto Marcellus, and some of them, in a strong Towne three miles off. Thefe had done what good they could to Syracufe, by doing what hurt they could unto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the state of Sicil was given as desperate by the Carthaginians: they fent Embaffadours to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselves, and for the Town. Hereunto Marcellus willingly gave eare: for he had staied there long enough; and had cause to seare, that after a little while, the Caribaginians might comethither strong againe. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; That they should be Masters of their owne, enjoyning their liberty and proper lawes; yet fuffering the Romanes to pol-30 feffe what foever had belonged unto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death; new Prætors chosen; and the gates even ready tobe opened unto Marcellus: when fuddenly the Roman fugitives disturbed all. These perceiving their owne condition to be desperate, perswaded the other Mercenarie Souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained onely for themselves, and betrayed the Army to the Romans. Wherefore they presently tooke Armes, and fell upon the new chosen Prætors; whom they flew, and made election of fixe Captaines that should command over all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Souldiers; excepting only the fugitives. The Treatie was therefore againe fet on foote, and wanted little of conclusion: which yet was delaied; either by some seare of the Citizens, that 40 had feene (as they thought) proofe of the Roman avarice in the fack of Epipola, Tyche,& Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that he might use the liberty of a Conqueror, & make it wholly subject to Rome. Mericm a Spaniard was one of the fixe Captaines, that had been chosen in the last commotion: a man of fuch faith, as usually is found in Mercenaries; holding his owne particular benefit above all other respects. With this Captaine, Marcellus dealt secretly: having a fit instrument, of the same Nation, one Belligenes, that went in company with the Romane Embassadors, daily passing to and fro. This craftie Agent perswaded Mericus, That the Romans had already gotten all Spaine: and that if ever he purposed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spaine, or any where else; it was now the onely 50 time to do it; by conforming himselfeto the will of the Roman Generall. By such hopes the Spanilb Captaine was easily won, and sent forth his owne brother among the Syracusian Embassadors to ratifie the covenant with Marcellus.

This under-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusians, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards throughly approved at his comming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had been such, as deserved not to be requited with the ruine of his Countrie: much lesse, that the miseries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their owne sollie) by an Army of Mercenaries, should minister unto the people of Rome, advantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired souldiers; and therefore were faine to yeeld unto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Army. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymns; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides: it had beene their chiefe care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately flaine many the principall of Epicides his followers; and many of themselves had also beene slaine, both lately and in former times, because of this their defire unto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rascalitie, and some ill advised persons, joyned with the souldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the flaughter which they heard to be done at Leonizum and afterward beheld in those parts of their owne City which was taken? Ought therefore the Romane Generall, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracusans, to make a bargaine under-hand against them. with a Captaine of the Mercenaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his returne home. But the Senators thought it a great deale better, to comfort the Syracultans with gentle words, & promise of good usage in time to come; than to restore the bootie, and give over the Dominion of a City, fo great, wealthy, ftrong, and many wayes important. Neverthelesse if we consider the many inconveniences and great mischiefes whereunto Syracufeswas obnoxious; both by evill neighbours, and by that very forme of policie, after which it was governed: wee may truely affirme. That it received no small benefit, by becomming subject unto Rome. For thereby it was not onely assured against all forraine enemies, domesticall conspiracies, and such Tyrants as of olde had reigned therein: but freed from the necessitie of banishing, or murdering, the most worthy Citizens; as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a thousand the like miferies, that were wont to grow out of the jealousie, wherein they held their liberty in vaine. Neither enjoyed that City, from her first foundation, any such long time of happinesse, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure under the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his victorie it was throughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serves not to make injuffice the more excufable: unleffe we should approve the answer of that Thiefe, who being found to have stollen a filver cup from a ficke man, faid, Hee never

By the treason of Mericus, the Roman Armie was let into possession of all Syracuse: wherein, the booty that it found, was faid to have bin no leffe, than could be hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it selfe; that maintained war by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly workes and Imageries, wherewith Syracufe was marvelloufly adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left untouched; fave onely the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman Campe. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented even by Marcellus himselfe. He was so busie about his Geometrie, in drawing figures, that he harkened not to the noyse, and uprore in the City; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellu tooke heavily the death of him; and caufed his body to be honourably buried. Upon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his lifetime) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion betweene them; which he first found out. An Invention of so little use, as this may seeme, plealed that great Artist better, than the devising of all those engine, that made him so famous. Such difference is in the judgement of learned men, and of the vulgar forr. For many an one would thinke the monie loft, that had bin spent upon a sonne, whose studies in the University had brought forth such fruit; as the proportion betweene a Sphere and a Cylinder -

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Townes in Sicil yeelded unto the Romans, except Agrigenium and a sew places thereabout. At Agrigenium lay Epicides with one Hanno a Carihaginian, & Musines an African, that was lately sent from Hannibal. This Musines by many good peeces of service, had added some credit to the beaten. Carihaginian side; and withall made his owne name great. By his perswassions, Hanno and Epicides adventured to meet Marcellus without the Towne; and not beliave themselves as menespeding to bee besieged. Neither was hee more valiant in counsell; than in execution. Once and againe he set upon the Romanes; where they say encamped; and drove themselves. This bred envie in Epicides & Hanno-especially in Hanno;

that having beene lately fent from Caribage, with commission and authoritie from the State, thought himselfe wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that he had fent unto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, & to take upon him, like as good a man as himselfe. The indignity feemed the greater, when Mutines being to ftep afide unto Heraclea, for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians; advised (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the enemie, untill his returne. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight: & offered battell unto Marcellus, before he fought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behind in Syracuse, as need required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But what soever disproportion was between the two Armies; farre greater were the oddes to betweene the Captaines. For howfoever the people of Carthage would give authority by favour; yet could they not give worth and ability, in matter of warre. The Numidia ans, having before conceived some displeasure against their Captains : and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclea; were much more offended, when they saw that the vaine-glorious envie of Hanno carried him unto the fight, upon a foolish defire to get victory, without the helpe of Mutines their Countriman. Wherefore they fent unto the Roman Generall, and bade him be confident; for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day, but only looke on, and see the proud Carihaginians well beaten, by whom they had beene misused. They made good their promise, and had their defire. For Marcellm, finding likelihood of truth in their meffage, did foluftily fer upon the enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter

If Hanno could have beene contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of Warrethan himselfe, and not have hazzarded a battell without need; the Romans would shortly have been reduced into termes of great difficulty in their Sicilian warre. For Marcellus was shortly after to leave the Province; and soone upon his departure, there landed in the Iland a supply of eight thousand foote, and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Caribage. The same of this new Armie drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Army confifting (for the most part) of the Legions of Canna, tooke it very hainously, that no good service done, could bring 30 them into the favour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent farre from home, and not suffered to returne back to Rome with their Generall. Mutines had pacified his countrimenthe Numidians; & like an honest man, did what he could for those whom he ferved, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might have beene, if the Army lately overthrowne had beene entire. M. Cornelius the Roman Prætor, used all diligence, both to pacifie his own men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered those In-land Townes that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Muines from over-running all the Countrey; yet he hindred the Countrey from revolting unto Mutines. Above threescore Townes, great and small, the Caribaginians held in Sicil: of which Agrigenium was the princi-40 pall, and farre bigger than any of the reft. Thence iffued Mutines as often as heepleafed, in despight of the Romanes: not onely to the succour of his owne adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrary part. But Hanne, in stead of being pleafed with all these good services, was filled more and more with envie, against the man that performed them. He had (belike) received instruction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to have share in the honour of these Secilian Warres : which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whileft Italie was neglected, that should have beene regarded more than all the rest. Wherefore to shew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint unto him an Affiftant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Muimes his charge, 50 and gave it to his owne fonne, thinking thereby to discountenance theman, and make him little effeemed, as one out of Office, among the Namidians. But it fell out quite contrary : and this spightfull dealing occasioned the losse of whatsoever the Carthagins ans held in Sicil. For the Numedians were so incensed by the indignity offered unto their Countriman, being such a brave Commander, that they offered him their service to require the wrong; and were the aceforth absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Lavinus, the Romane Confull, was newly come into the Province, when this fell out : and with him did Mutiner enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke these indignities; but being neither a Carthaginian, nor favoured by those that bore all the fway in Carthage: Hethought it the wifeft way, to play the best of his own game, and forfake that Citie, which was likely to periff by the evil counsell that governed it. He did not therefore, as his Countrimen had lately done, content himfelfe to fee his Adversaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious over-weening; and to suffer that harme, in doing whereof he would not beare a part; but conspired against them to deliver up Agrigentum, and to helpe to expell them utterly out of Sieil. The Confull was glad of his friendship; and carefully followed his advertisements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Mutines had undertaken: For he with his Namidians did forcibly feize upon a gare; whereat they let in fome Roman Companies, that lay neere in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noise, thought it had been no worse matter, than some such number of the Numidians, as he had beene well acquainted with of late. But when, making hafte to pacific the trouble, he faw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those difcontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betooke himselfe to flight: and saving himselfe, with Epicides, in a small Barke, fer faile for Africke; leaving all his Army and Adherents in Sieil, to the mercie of the Romans, that henceforward continued mafters of the whole Iland.

Lavinus the Conful having taken Agrigentum, did sharpe execution of justice upon all othe Citizens. The principall of them he foourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the maner of the Romans: all the rest of them he fold for slaves, and confiscated their goods; fending home to Rome the mony that was raifed of the bootie. This was indeede a time, wherein Rome flood in no leffe necessity of gold, than of fleele: which may have been the reason, why Lavinus dealt so cruelly with the Agricentines. Nevertheleffe the fame of such severity bred a terrour among all the Dependants of the Carthat in great haste they fought to make their peace. About forty Townes veelded themselves quickly unto the Romans; twenty were delivered up by Treason; and fixe onely flaved to be wonne by force. These things done, Lavinus returned home to Rome; carrying with him about foure thousand men from Agatirna; that were a to company of out-lawes, bankrouts, and banished men, accustomed to live by spoile of others, in these troublesome times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italy, where they might exercise their own occupation against the Brutians; a theevish kinde of people, that were enemies unto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Musines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he lived in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipio's in their journy against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is said) very especiall service. So by this enterprise of Sieil, the Carihaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might have beene employed in Italy : leaving yet unto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire possession of this Iland; which they wanted when it began.

6. X V I.

How the warre passed betweene the Romans and Hannibal in Italy, from the taking of Capua to the oreat vistorie at Metaurus.

Hortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good fervices done in the Iland of Sical; he had granted unto him the honour of the leffer Triumph, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denied him : because hee had not finished the warre, but was faine to leave his Army behinde him in the Province. He staied not long in Rome, before he was againe chosen Consult To together with M. Valerius Lavinus, who fucceded him in the government of Sicil, and was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Consul Marcellus, by the Syracusians, for that which he had done unto them : they alledging their great friend thip to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their City did never willingly breake the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Romethanto all good men that lived in Syracufe. The Conful, on the other fide, reckoned the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to bemoane themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessity; and not unto the Romans whom they had kept out. Thus each part having some good matter to alledge, the Senate made such an end of the controversie, as best agreed with the benefit of their owne Common-weath: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring the bootie that he had taken, nor making the Syracusians free from their subjection, but comforting them with gentle words, and hopefull promises, as hath beene shewed before. The two new Consuls Marcellus and Levinus, were appointed to make swar, as their lots should fall out; the one in Italy, the other in Sical. The Isle of Sicil sell unto Marcellus; which Province he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracusians (whose cause had not as yet beene heard in the Senate) might not seeme hindred by sear-strom uttering their grievances freely. Afterwards, when his businesse with them was dispatcht, hee gently undertooke the patronage of them: which seemed long in his Familie, to the great benefit of their Countrie in times following. So Valerius, the other Consul, was sent into Sical, whose doings there have been already rehearsed: but Marcellus was employed against Hannibal.

Before the Confuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with preffing of Souldiers to the war, and most of all, with getting Marriners for their Navie. They were all of the poorer fort, that used to be emploied in Sea-services, especially in rowing. These could not live without present wages: neither was there monie enough in the Treasurie to give them pay. Where fore it was ordained, that they should bee set out at the expence of private men; who in this necessity of the State, were driven to sustaine 20 all publike charges. Hereat the people murmured, and were ready to fall into fedition. had not the Confuls deferred the matter unto further confideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a case of such extremity. For manifest it was, that the multitude had already endured fo much, as well it could undergoe; and somewhat more, than could with honesty have been imposed upon it. Neverthelesse it was imposfible to maintaine the war against the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italy, without a strong fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion; That, since the common Treasure was so emptie, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden upon them. At last the Consuls began to say, That no perswasions would be fo effectuall with the people, as good examples : and that if the Senators would follow 30 the Consuls, like it was , that the people also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That every one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasurie, all the money that he had; and that no Senator should keepe any veffell of gold, or plate what soever; excepting one Salt-seller, and a Bowle wherewith to make their offerings unto the gods; as also a Ring for himselfe, with such other tokens of ingenuitie for his wife and children, as every one did use, and those of as finall value as might be. This advice of the Confuls was not more thankefully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded, and hastily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonaltie refuse to doe that, which their betters had openly done before them. For fince the publike 40 necessity could no otherwise be holpen; every one was contented, that his private estate should run the same fortune with the Common-wealth, which if it suffered wracke, in vaine could any particular man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper substance. This magnanimitie deserved well that greatnesse of Empire, whereof it was the foundation

Convenient order being thus taken for an Army and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the City against Hannibal; & Lacinus toward Sicil. The army of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard service: neither did his Carthaginians seeme to remember him, and thinke upon sending the promised supply, or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakned, by the loss of Capua; which gave them cause to looke unto themselves; as if in his helpe there were little trust to be 50 reposed, when they should stand in neede. This he well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he must thrust Garrisons into all Townes that he suspected, and thereby so diminish his Armie, that he should not be able to keepe the field: or essential leave them to their owne sidelity, which now began to waver. At length his jealousie grew so outragious, that he sacked, and wasted those places that he was unable to defend: thinking that the best way to enrich himselse; and make unprofitable, to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alsenated from him; and some of those, whom before he had least cause.

to doubt. The Towne of Salapia yeelded unto Marcellus; and betraied unto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that served under Hannibal; which was a greater losse, than the Town it selse. Blasius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his desire to effect; without getting the consent of one Dasius, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dasius in private; and was by him accused unto Hannibal. But when he was convented and charged of Treason, hee so stouly denied it; and by way of recrimination, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the same fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter devised out of meetermalice; knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing, that neither of them could bring any proofe of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to presse his adversarie anew, and urge him from time to time, with such lively reasons; that he who could not be believed by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the savour of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Consul took by force, Maronea and Meles, Towns of the Samnives; wherein he slew about three thousand of Hannibal his men.

Hannebal could not looke to all at once: but was faine to catch advantages, where he might get them; the Romans now being growne stronger in the field than he. The best was that his Carthaginians, having wearied themselves with ill speede in many pettie enterprises, and laid afide all this while the care of Italy, to follow businesse of far lesse importance; had now at length refolved, to fend prefently the great fupply, that had beene o folong promised & expected. This if they had done in better season; Rome it selfe might: have been strucken down, the next yeer after that great blow received at Canna. But since that which is past cannot bee amended; Hannibal must force himselfe to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mighty fuccour would come time enough. For Mafanilla was at Carthage with five thousand Numidians, ready to set faile for Spain; whither when he came, it was appointed that Afdrubal should forthwith take his journie into Italy, of which there had beene folong talke. These newes did not more comfort Hannibal & his followers, than terrefie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best: the Romans to prevent the threatning mischiefe, and winne as much as they could upon Hannibal, before the comming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrary, to hold his owne, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Prætor, lay neere unto Herdonea to get the Towne by practice. It was not long, fince neere unto the fame place, another Cn. Fulvius had loft his Army. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; & came to Herdonea ere Fulviu heard news of his approach. As soone as he came, he offered battaile to the Roman Prætor; who accepted it with more hafte than good fpeede. The Roman Legions made good refiftance a while, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rout; and great flaughter was made of them. Falvim himselfe, with twelve Tribunes or Coronels, were lost: of the common Souldiers, that were flaine, the number is uncertaine; some reporting seven, others thirteene thousand. The Towne of Herdonea, beto cause it was at point to have yeelded unto Fulrius, Hannibal did set on fire : and putting those to death that had practised with the Enemy carried away the multitude, whom he bestowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Conful Marcellus hearing of this, wrote unto the Senate: & exhorted them to be of a good cheere for that hee would shortly abate the enemies pride. He followed the Carthaginian apace; and overtaking him at Numifero in the Countrie of the Lucans, fought with him a battell: which beginning at nine of the clocke in the morning, lasted untill night; & ended, by reason of the darkenes, with uncertaine victory. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him . At Venusia they met, & had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Hannibal removed often; and fought to bring the enemy within danger of lome ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battaile, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light, and upon faire ground.

Thus passed the time away, untill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fukcius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius, considering how much the Romane affaires were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that yeere to besiege Tarentum: which if he could winne; like it was, that scarce one good City would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Mircellus, (to whom was continued the command of those Legions that served under him the yeer before) to presse the Carthaginian so hard, as he might have no leisure to helpe

Tarentum, Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Cannufum, and thence from place to place : defiring ever to come to battaile, but upon equall termes. The Caribaginian had not minde to hazzard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertaine his enemie with skirmish; as being desirous to keepe his Army strong untill the comming of Asdrubal. Yet could he not avoide the importunity of Marcellus, nor brooke the indignity of being daily braved. He therefore bade his mento be lufty, and to beat foundly this hot-spirited Roman Captaine, that would never suffer them to be at quiet; untill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battaile; wherein Hannibal had the victory; tooke fixe Enfignes; 10 & flew of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of marke. Marcellus was fo impatient of this dishonour, that he rated his men, as Pesants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had been beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood, without being circumvented by any stratageme. With these, and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to heare, he did fo vexe them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their Generall; they belought him to pardon them, and leade them forth once againe to fight. He did fo: and placing those Companies formost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victory; whereof the newes might be at Rome, before the report of their 20 shamefull overthrow. Hannibal was angry, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet : and therefore was ready to fight againe; fince all other motives continued the fame, and his men had beene hartned by the late victory. But the Romanes were stirred up with defire of revenge, & of repairing their honor loft, which affections gave a sharpe edge unto their valour : whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victory, as ready to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victory: which he purchased at so deare a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slaine. and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, to than even to recompence the late received overthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was fo great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hanmibal; who dislodged by night. Neverthelesse it sufficed, that Fabius the Consull hereby got leifure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. 2. Fulvim the other Conful, about the same time, tooke in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Volscentes, that willingly yeelded themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Townes: whom Fulvius entertained in loving fort; gently rebuking them for their errours past, without punishing those that had beene authours, or busie doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian theeves, which Lavinus had lately brought from Agaterna, was then also set on worke to besiege Caulonia, a Towne of the Bruti- 40 ans: and nothing was omitted, that might serve to divert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

2. Fabius the Conful having taken Manduria a Towne of the Salentines, fate downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carry it, either by asfault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Towne, a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, under a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Captaine fell in love with a Tarentine wench; whose brother served under Fabins. Hereof, the gave notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman fide; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her lover was. But her brother made the Conful acquainted with these newes: and said, that if the Bruian were farre in love, he s might perhaps be wonne, by intreaty of his Mistris, to doe what she would have him. The Confull hearing this, and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his fouldier to convey himself into the Towne as a fugitive, and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his defire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captaine: and partly by his owne perswasions, partly by the flattering entreatie of his fifter; wanne him to betray the Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed upon the businesse, and resolved how to order it the same Souldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Confull with his proceedings: telling him in which part that Bruizan keept watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gave an alarm to the Citie; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captaines in the Towne, prepared to make refiltance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himselfe with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captaine, helped the Romans to get up, and breake open the next gate, whereat the Armie was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian Souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but (as hapneth in like cases, where the maine confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, used now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carebalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselfe prisoner; hoping to be well used, because of hospitalitie that had passed between his Father and the Consult. But he was flaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the fword, in fuch fort, that they spared few of the Brutans. This slaughter of the Brutian, was thought to have been made by appointment of the Confull to the end that he might seeme to have wonne the Towne by force and not by treason : though he thereby failed of his purpole; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasurie, whither it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curiofities, that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of some Idols that seemed worthy to be carried away, beeing very goodly pieces, in fuch habit and positure as if they were fighting : he said Let us leave unto the Tarentines their angrie gods.

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellu, fell upon those that besieged Caulonia They fled at his comming : but he was so neere, that they were faine to betake them to a hill, which served to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yeelded. When this businesse was done, he hasted away to relieve Tarentum. But when he came within five miles of the City, he hadnews that it was loft. This grieved him: yet he faid no more than this. The Romans have also their Hannibal; we have lost Tarentum in such fort as we got it. That he might not seeme to turne backe amazed, or in any seare of the victorious Consult; he incamped afew dayes together, so neere as he was unto Tarentum: and thence departing to Meiaponium, bethought himselfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write unto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison: with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. These letters were sent by two yong men of the same city; who did their errand so well, that the Confull wrote backe by them unto the Metaponianes, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leifure made ready his ambushes for the warie Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot were given; or whether indeede (as it is related) fome tokens in facrificing, terrefied the superstitious Roman; the journey to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were employed againe: but being apprehended, and threatned with torture, they discovered all.

This yeere was happy to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got every where. lave onely at Caulonia; where they loft a company of fuch lewd fellowes, that it may feeme good fortune, to have so been rid of them. But their common poverty, & disability to maintaine their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italy: of which, twelve refused to contribute any longer to the Wars. For it was confidered; that the Legions of Canna, and those unhappy Com-Panies that had beene beaten under the one and the other Cn. Fulving, were transported into Sacil; where they lived, in a fort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon up the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeeres together they had beene exhaufted with levies of men, and impofitions of money: in every of which yeeres they had received some notable overthrow. In this case the least that they could feare; or rather the best that they could hope; was to fall into the hands of the enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe within a while, that they should be all confumed : fince new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones never returned. Such talke was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicil, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Surrium, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelve, That they should boldy deny unto the Romans their farther helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace; whereof otherwise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal lived. When the Consuls heard the Embaffadors of these Townes make such declaration, and protest their disabilitie of giving any farther helpe; they were much amazed. They willed the Embaffadours to 10 returne home, and bring a better answer, forasmuch as this was none other than treafon: they bade them to confider, that the people were not Campahs or Tarentines, but the off-fpring of the Romans; and no leffe partakers of the Empire; than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie, But all would not ferve the Embassaddir's continuing to protest, that they had already done what they could, and that they had remaining, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eighteene Colonies did not imitate thefe twelve; but shewed themselves willing to undergoe what loever should be layed upon them, without thrinking under the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls; that the Embassadors of those faithful Colonies, were brought unto the Senate, and produced into the Affembly of the people: where, with commemoration of all their former good fervices, this their prefent love unto the State was magnified, and thankes accordingly beflowed upon them, with promife, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embaffadors of those twelve Colonies, that refused to contribute; it was thought best, neither to retaine them in the Cirie, nor yet to dismisse them, nor take any notice of them at all; but leave them to their owne confideration of their

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelve people would have wrought in those that were so willing to help the State; if Aftrubat had been then comming into reals. For then must the Romanes have becaken themselves wholly to their tivine defence whereas now to the great comfort of their fubjects, they employed their 30 forces in the conquest of Fiely, with hopeful and forumate successe. Neverthelest, they were faine to open their most privietreasurie and thence take out the gold that had beene layed up to ferve them in cases of greatest extremity. Of the money thus extracited, one quarter was delivered to Fabius the Confull, to fet him well out against the Tarentines; all the reft was fent into Spaine to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Army; and to provide, that Afdrubal might not paffe from thence into Italy. It is likely that Fabrus did not spend all his money; finding fuch easie successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before. Bur to stop the Journey of Afdrabal; neither the money fent into Spaine, nor any victories won by Seipio could suffice. Nevertheleffe it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this yeere and the next were spent, before his comming; and they better 40 prepared, than at leffe warning they could have beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amiffe to note, That fince the Romans, being in fo great necessity of money, were driven to furnish the Armiein spaine, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left; it must needs be, that either the bootie taken in new Carthage, was farre lesse than Pame had reported it 3 or elfe that Scipio had not as yet wonne it : howfoever Livie rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soon after his arrivall.

ther inclines to thole, who tay that he got it followings, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and M. Claudius Marcellus, & T. Quimus Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fuhius: In their yeere it was, that Assubal tooke his journey out of Spaine, though he came not into Italy untill the yeere following. After the great battaile at Canna, Hamibal had lost much time about Cuna and Naples, in seeking to make himselfe Master of a good haven, for the landing of those successful that were promised from Caribage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his principall care to the Easterne parts of Italy; where he made ready a faire entrance for the Macedonian, is he had been ready to come. But since his hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Assubal was (though farre later than had been expedient) ready to arrive: he began to deale with the people of Herraria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein he might make a partie against the Romans. The loss of Capua, Tarentum, & many other Towns, might have terrested all other of the Italian Towns, from harkening to any folicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the poverty of the Romans, & the wearings of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Army comming than that which Hannibal brought into Italy; did imbolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Aretines, to take such counsell as they thought most expedient for themselves, without regard of their fidelity to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of their conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose comming did so terrefie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the yeare following they were devising how to breake out: as contrariwise the Roman Propretors, partly by terrour of severe judgments and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which to they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wills, and tooke many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest defire, to make strong Warre upon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselves, that in bartell they should bee too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular defire, to make his Confulship notable by the Winning of some good Towne : as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the fiege of Locritone of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italy and brought thither all forts of engines : fending for a Fleet out of Sicil to helpe him. But Hannibal was not flow to relieve the City: the fame of whose approach, made Crispinus defist from his enterprise, and retire unto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thitherfollowed Hannibal. to whom the Confuls daily offered battell. This great man of Warre had no need to fland upon his reputation: which was already fo confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed unto feare; but rather deemed as part of his wisedome. He entertained the Confuls with many light skirmishes, and sought to take them at some advantage; referving his owne numbers as full as he could, unto a time of greater imployment. In this lingring manner of War, Marcellus tooke no pleasure: but sought to compell the Enemy to battell, whether he would or no. The Admirall of the Roman Fleet about Sicil, L. Cincius, was commanded again to affaile the Towne of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began, to trifle away the time at Venuha. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to go 30 by land to the affiftance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behind him. He laid an ambush in the way, between Tarentum and Locri, whereinto the Romans fell: and having lost above three thousand of their Company, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprise, and save their owne lives within Tarentum. As for the Confuls, it was the defire of Hannibal to waste their Army by little and little; which to doe, he neglected no advantage. There lay between him and them an Hillock, over growne with wood, that feemed fit to cover a number of men: who lying there undifferned, might fall upon fuch as should straggle from the Roman campe; and cut them off. Therefore he fent thither by night fome companies of Numidians: whom he willed to keep themselves close, and attend their best advantage. To this piece of ground the Consuls thought it fitto remove their Camp: Marcellus thinking that he never lay near enough unto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the fon of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principall men; and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinel gave warning of their approach to his fellows who discovered not themselves untill they had surrounded the Consuls and their train. The Confuls, as necessity compelled them, defended themselves thoping to be quickly relieved from their Campe that was near at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weake assistance of no more than forty horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregella. These Fregellans abode by the Confuls, and did whatthey could to have brought them fafe off. But when Marcel-50 lus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and fell downe dead; then began every one to shift for himselfe, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consul, had his deaths wound, being stricken with two Darts; and young Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recovered their campe: The rest of the Colonels and Officers, together with the Lictors that carried the bundles of Rods and Axes before the Confuls, were all flaine or taken. To the dead body of the Conful Marcellus, Hannibal gave honourable Funerall, according to the custome of those times: and bestowing his ashes in a filver pot, covered it with a crown of gold; and so sent them to yong Marcellus, tobe by him interred, where he thought good.

Prefently after this, Crispinus bethought himselfe, how that the fignet Ring of Marcellus yvas falne into the custody of Hannibal; vvho might use it to his owne purposes. ere that which had hapned were wel known abroad. Wherefore he fent word unto all the Towns about; that his Colleague vvas flain, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wishing them in that regard, to give no credit unto any letters therewithall figned. This providence of Crispinus vvas not more than requisite. For his Messenger vvas but a little before come to Salapia, vyhen another Messenger arrived there sent from Hannibal. bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and fealed with the captive Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night unto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such imploy- 10 ment as he should thinke needfull. The device was plaine, and no lesse plaine was the revengefull mind which he bare against that City; because of his brave Numidian companies that had therein been betrayed. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their enemy in his own fnare. They fent back the Messenger, which vvas a Roman fugitive, without letting him perceive any figne of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainement of such a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitives armed Roman-like, leading the vvav. Thefe all talking Latine together, called unto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Conful was there. The gate was opened faire and leifurely, and the Port-cullis drawn up no higher than needs it must be, to let them enter. But when fixe hundred of them were 20 gotten in downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to have taken others, were taken themselves; being laid at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an

Hannibal being thus over-reached vvith this stratageme, hasted away to Losri; whereunto Cincius the Admirall of the Roman steet about Sicil, didlay hard steet. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantcurrors, made the Romans in all consuled haste, run to their ships: leaving all their engines, and whatsoever was in their Campe, to the enemies disposition. The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent unto Crispinus the furviving Conful & requested him to name a Dictator that might take charge of the Comon-wealth, 20 and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesse; whereunto himselse vvas difabled by his hurts. He did fo: and foon after died. Then vvas it thought needfull, that new Confuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay so neare unto the Enemy, without any Generall. Especially it was defired, that Election should be made of such men as vvere not onely valiant, but vvell advised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by losing himselse so strangely, had given them a faire warning, not to commit their Army unto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. He was of great Nobility, agood Souldier, and one, whose many services in this present War, did forcibly commend unto the place. Yet he feemed a little too violent; and one, 40 whose temper needed the allay of a more stayed wit. The fathers therefore endeavoured to joyne unto him in the Consulship, M. Livius: one that had borne the same Office long before. This M. Livius had been Conful with L. Amilius Paulus, in the yeare foregoing the beginning of this Warre. After their Confulship, wherein they did good service, they had both of them been called into judgement by the People: and this Livius condemned; Amilius hardly escaping. Though it hath beene once already noted; yet I cannot forbeare to remember it againe: how it pleased God to upbraid the unthankfull Romans, with the malicious judgement, given by their multitude upon honourablemen-For in the battell of Canna, it was apparent, what lamentable effects the memory of their injustice wrought: when L. Emilius rather chose to yeeld to the frowardigno-50 rance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatest overthrow that ever fell upon the State of Rome, than by refifting the pernicious courles of Terentius Varro, to cast himselfe anew upon the danger of the popular fury. As for M. Livius, he is even now ready, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faults in adivers manner. Fight years together after his condemnation, had he been absent out of the City, and lived in his Countrey Grange; still vexing himselfe with the indignity of his condemnation. Marcellus and Lavinus, being Consuls two or three yeares agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he lived private in discontented fort, as might appeare, both by his carelefnesse imapparell, and by the wearing of his long haire and beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Cenfors to poll his haire, and come into the Senate: where he used to fit filent, and fignific his affent or diflike to what was proposed, either in short formall words, or in passing from fide to fide, when the house was divided. At length it hapned, that in some businesse weightily concerning one that was his kinsman; he stood up and made a set speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had beene. The Senate was much altered fince he had left it; many brave men were lost; new ones were chosen; such as rather served to fill up the number, than to answer to the dignity of the place: and they that were left of ancient standing, had even spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore all beganto fay; that it was great pity, fo worthy and ablea man as this Livius, had been all this while forgotten; one of whom the Common-wealth stood in great need, vet had notused in this dangerous warre. Now seeing that the Consuls ought, one of them, to be chosen a Patrician, the other, of necessity a Plebeian: and since neither Fabius, nor Valerius Lavinus, being both of them Patricians, could be joyned with Claudius Nero: every one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Livius. But Livie would not endure to heare of this. He faid it was unreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be chosen Ruler of the Citie. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consul-10 ship, what meant they then to offer him another ? With these, and the like phrases he resifted their defires: till by perfivations, and examples rehearfed, of fuch as had patiently digested injuries done by the people, and repaied good for evill; he was contented to accept

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Ashenians: resembling himselse to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughes where of men breake in faire weather; but run under it for shelter in a storme. Such unthankfulnesse, to well-deserving men, is not rarely found in the outragious multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much unlike, of Philip the second King of Spaine his dealing with the Duke of Aiva. For although he had committed the Duke to prison, upon some small offence conceived, without all regard of his former deserts yet when his intended conquest of Portugal, required the service of a man, more than ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer upon the scanning of late displeasures; but employed the same Duke, whom he had newly disgraced. Thus is wisedome often taught by pressessing.

It was a dangerous yeare toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius were chosen Consuls. Afdrubal was already come into France, and waited onely, to have the wayes of the Alpes thawed by warme weather, for his paffage into Italy. The Romans used at this time the service of three and twenty Legions: and wanted not imployment for many nore, if they had knowne how to levie and maintaine them. Of these which they had, foure served in Spaine, two in Sicil, and two in Sardinia: the rest were so disposed, in severall parts of Italy, where need feemed to require, that onely two Legions were left to each of the Confuls. But the Confuls were men of execution: and would not be tyed to the punctuall observance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Livius would not stirre out of Rome, against so mighty a power as followed Afdrubal, untill he had first obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could well be spared from other imployments; and those, or the most of them, chosen Companies. It was true, that two Legions, appointed to ferve under Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that year, among the Cifalpine Gaules, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Livius; to whom the War against o Ajdrubal was allotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salentines, neare unto Tarentum, under another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudies his Army, that was sent against Hannibal. Neverthelesse, the Consuls, by the especiall instance of Livie, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne discretion. For newes came, that Afdrubal was already paffing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Countrey about Genua, with their Neighbour people, were in readinesse to joyne with him; and L. Porcius sent word, that he would adventure no further, than he safely might. When all was ordered, as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the Citie; each his severall way. The people of Rome were now quite otherwise affected than they had beene, when L. Emilius Paulus and C. Terent ius Varro, were fent against Hannibal. They did no longer take upon them, to direct their Generals, or bid them dispatch, and winne the victorie betimes : but rather they stood in seare, lest all diligence, wisedome and valour should prove too little. For since few years had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not been slaine; and since it was manifest, that ifeither of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst; the two Carthagimians would forthwith joyne, and make short worke with the other: it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should returne home Victor; and come off with honour, from such mighty opposition, as he was like to finde. Withex. treme difficulty had Rome held up her head, ever fince the battell of Canna: though it were forthat Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the War in Italy. But there was now arrived another sonne of Amilear; and one, that in his present Expedicion, had seemed aman of more sufficiencie than Hannibal himselfe. For whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, over great Rivers and Mountaines, that were thought unpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Armie: this Afdrub st in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and gathering the people. that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-ball, farre greater than he came over the Pyrences at his first setting out of Spaine. These considerations and the like, of which feare presented many unto them; caused the people of Rome. to wait upon their Consuls out of the Towne, like a pensive traine of Mourners: 20 thinking upon Marcellus and Crispinus, upon whom in the like fort they had given attendance the last yeare; but faw neither of them returne alive, from a lesse dangerous Warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gave his accustomed advice to M. Livius, that he should abstaine from giving, or taking battell, untill he well understood the Enemies condition. But the Conful made him a froward answer, and faid, That he would fight the very first day : for that he thought it long, till he should either recover his honour by victory; or by feeing the overthrow of his owne unjust Citizens, sat issie himselfe with the joy of a great, though not an honest revenge. But his meaning was better than his words. Of the overthrow that Ashrubal received in Spaine by Scipio, a little before he took 20 his journy into Italy; fuch mention hath already been made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Livie. Yet I thinke it not amille to adde in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his History concerning that ac-Except E. Polys. cident. Afdrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spaine; by reason of those Cap Except.E.1019. taines that were fent from the City of Carthage, to joyne with him in the administration of that Province: they being, as it may feeme, of the Hannonian faction; which is to fay, thus farre forth Traytors, that they preferred the advantage of their own fide, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthy fonne of Amiliar, and how they hindred his courses undertaken, it cannot be knowne: since of those bookes, wherein Polybins hath exactly handled these matters, there are to us remaining onely a few broken pieces. But by the spightfull dealing of Hanno in Sicil with Mutines, a better man of Warre than himfelfe, whom Hannibal had fent into the Ilanda we may conceive, that against the brother of Hannibat it was thought needfull, by these mischievous Partizans of Hanno, to use the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Neverthelesse, Astrabal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently fuch indignities, as Mutines could not long digeft. His journey into Italy being refolved upon: he lay with part of the Army at Betula, not farre from the Mines of filver ; whence he was to furnish his Expedition. Thirher came Scipio: and dravehim out of his Campe, though hee were itrongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captaines could, or would, come to his affiftance. The overthrow feemes not to have 50 beene so great, as it must have beene supposed, if no way lay open to those that sled. Rather it appeares, that Afterbal dealt like a provident man, and feeing that his Campe was likely to be forced fent away all his money with his Elephants before him : but staid bebirid himselfe to sustaine the Romans a while, untill his carriages might be out of damger. Merein he had his defire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together and retyred in fuch fort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed over Togus. Then taking unco him the forces affigned for his expedition, he marched away towardthe Pyrenees : leaving the care of Spaine unto his brother Mage, and to Aftribal

the some of Gefco; that thought himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof. Faine would Scipio have stopped him on his journey, by fending to defend against him the ordinary way of the Mountains. But whether Afdrubal took another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had fet to keep the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly forts to no good effect) he was not letted in his voyage by any such impediment. Comming into Gaule, and following the steps of his brother Hanmbal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, fo well affected, either to him or to his mony, that no passages were defended against him, nor any fort of resistance made; but he, and his Armie well entertained, and their number much increased, by accesse of such as were o desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choyce for that he was driven to winter in their Country; whilest that the passages of the Alpes were closed up with Ice and Snow. The Mountainers likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his journy over the Alps, were eafily won to take part with Afdrubal, when he travelled thorow their Countrey. For these poor men, at the first comming of Hannibal, were verily perfwaded, that it was his purpose to rob them of their cattell; and to make spoile of that little wealth which they had painefully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in processe of time, they were better informed. Therefore understanding, that there were two mighty Cities, farre dif-joyned afunder, which made Warre upon each other, by Land and Sea; and that the Alpesdid onely lye in the way: they gladly conto descended to take their part in the fortune of the Invaders. The like affection upon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cifalpine Gaules. The Ligurians also joyned with Afdrubal: and so would the Hetrurians have done, if he had arrived in their Countrey. There was no other Roman Armieneare, than L. Portius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Afdrubal fet upon Placentia. a Roman Colonie: in hope to make his comming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Towne. But there he lost a great deale of time, and finally was driven to quit the enterprise: by undertaking which, he gave the Roman Confuls leifure to make ready for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who upon the first bruit of Asarubal his so timely, and eafily passing the Alpes, was about to leave his wintring Campes, and goe o forth to meet with him) to fit still awhile, as well aware that Placentia would not be taken in hafte.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Conful, made what speed he could to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from joyning with his brother. He had about forty thousand foot, and five hundred horse: with which he daily offered battel to the Carthaginians; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driven to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, into the Country of the Brutians, there to encrease his forces; which were otherwise too weak for the journey intended. Afterward comming to Grumentum, a Towne of the Lucans, hethere fought unprosperously with Nero the Conful. Nevertheleffe, he got off, and marched away to Venufia. But Ne-70 followed him, and had there agains the better of him. Wherefore he was driven to 40 returne to Mesapontum: where joyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Army, he affayed againe to make way by force to his brother. So he paffed onward, and came againe to Venusia, having Nero still at his heeles. Thence went he over the River Ansidus, to Canufium, where he fate downe not farre from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victory. There also did Nero sit downe by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps unto Hannibal, who knew the Countrey very vvell; that his brother might with little impediment, overcome the vvay to Canufium: vvhere if he could once again deale with both the Confuis, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victory, as once he had gotten in the same open Country. If this had so falne out; Rome voould have been undone for ever. But the Carthaginians should not have needed to wish any second victory, in the naked Campans about Canna; if fuch an Army as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when he was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keep the field. Wherefore this vyorthy Generall had good reason afterward to fay, that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beate him out of Italy; which else no power of the Romans could have done.

Whilest Nero waited upon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Army that was comming to their fuccour : he was advertised of

Astrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. These gave notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could be made by Livre the Conful. Of these news Claudius Nero was nothing joyfull. For if Hannibal could once be joyned as head, unto that great body of an Army, which Afdrubal brought with him: it was most apparent, that howfoever the fortune of Rome should avoid, for the present, any great calamity; yet the very continuance of so strong a warre at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Affociates, to faint under the burden; as twelve of the thirty Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore he refolved, that it were better to make any desperate adven- 10 ture, than to suffer the conjunction of two such malevolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the sudden, yet within few yeeres, was like to worke most lamentable effects. It feemed apparent, that his Colleague was unable to ftay the progresse of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readinesse, that could doe service in such a needfull case; excepting those, that were already employed under the two Consuls. Hereupon he concluded that it was not expedient for him to tye himselfe to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal: but rather that it behoved him, to helpe where more necessity required; and to carry part of his forces unto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet fince the meeting of the two Carthaginian brethren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth: it feemed the best 20 way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the lesse importance. Sixe thoufand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore tooke, that were the very choice of his Army: and making shew, as if he would onely step aside, to doe some small piece of fervice neare at hand; away hee posted as fast as he could, to affist his fellow Conful. His Messengers ranne before him, to give warning to all Townes by which he wasto passe, that they should be ready to meete him with victuals, and all other necessaries for his Army. Living the other Conful, at that time, lay encamped neare unto Sena Gallica; and Asarubal within halfe a mile of him. In fixe dayes Nero had finished his journey thither; and when he drew neare, fent Messengers before him, to give notice of his comming. Livie thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of covert untill 30 darke night, and then enter fecretly into the Campe: left the Enemy, perceiving this accesse of strength, should accordingly frame his counsels. This was done and a token given, that the Colonels, Captaines, and all Souldiers, aswell horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him, should be lodged and entertained by men of their owne fort. Their Company was somewhat increased by Voluntaries that joyned with him on the way. Neverthelesse, it was not needfull that the Quarter which received them, should bee enlarged; fince they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counfell of Warre: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arrived Companies to refresh themselves a few dayes after their weary journey, before they should be drawne forth to battell. But against this, Nero was very ear- 40 neft: and befought his Colleague, to make use of him out of hand; that he might betimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hannibal should have notice of his absence. The Souldiers also of Nero were full of spirit; perceiving that the honour of the victory was like

As farubal was no leffe willing than the Romans to come to battell, having long defired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Army, to behold the Enemies countenance: it 50 feemed to him, that they were more than they had been; and some of their armes and horses looked as though they had wanted dressing, after a long journey. Hercupon he began to with-draw his Army backe into the Campe: and gave order, that if no prifoners could be taken, by whom he might be certified of the truth; yet should there good observation be made, whether the Enemies Campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their forces to be increased. The Camp, as hath beene faid was not extended: but the trumpet, that founded onely once in the Quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrary to former custome, found twice in to be theirs : for a fruch as the battell would not have been undertaken, without this their comming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counsell brake up, that the figne of battell should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coate over the Generals

the quarter of Livingthe Conful. Hereat Afdrubal greatly mused: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders, held this for a fure token, that the other Confull was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were alive, and in good case, he was not able to conjecture: but thought it the best way, to goe leisurely to worke, till he might be better informed. Upon confidence in his owne forces, he had not cared hitherto. how neere he lay to the Romans; nor troubled himself perhaps with over-strongly forrifying his owne Campe. Yet when he now perceived, that somewhat was fallen out helide his expectation, he changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remove a little further off. So he dislodged secretly by night, intending to get over the River Meraurus; whereby to keepe himselfe as long as he could, from necessity of battell.. But whether it were fo, that his guides did fteale away from him in the dark, fo that he could not finde the way to the Foords; or whether his carriages were too heavie, and hindred his speed: farre he had not gone, ere the Consull Nero was at his heeles with all the Roman horse, and stayed him from passing any further. Soone after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Confull followed anon with all the Legions: in good order, and ready for battell. Asdrubal, seeing himselfe overtaken with necessisty to fight, omitted no care and circumspection. His Gaules, in whom he reposed least confidence, he placed in his left wing upon a Hill, which the Enemie should not, without much difficultie, be able to climbe: in the right wing he stood himselfe with his Africans and Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed in the midft; and his Elephants he bestowed in the front of his battels. On the Roman fide, Nero had the leading of the right wing, Livius of the left, and Porcius of the battell. Both Romans and Carthaginians well understood how much depended upon the fortune of this day ; and how little hope of safety there was unto the vanquished. Onely the Romans herein seemed to have had the better in conceit and opinion; That they were to fight with men defirous to have fled from them. And according to this prefumption, came Living the Confull with a proud bravery, to give charge on the Africans, by whom he was fo sharply entertained, that the victory seemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were souldiers, and well acquainted with the maner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a to hardy Nation, and not accustomed to give ground; which they needed the leffe, or were able now no doe, being placed in the midft. Livius therefore, and Porcius, found frrong opposition: and with great flaughter on both sides, prevailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their first ranks; and put them in fuch diforder, as the Roman Enfignes were driven to fall backe. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vaine against a steepe Hill, was unable to come to blowes with the Gaules, that stood opposite unto him, but out of danger. This made Afdrubal the more confident; who, feeing his owne left wing fafe; did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other side, upon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero perceiving that the place wherein he flood, was fuch as would compell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended; tooke a part of his forces, and led them round behind the forces of Porcius and Livins: which having compassed, he fell upon Afdrubal, and charged him in the flanke. Here began the victory to bee manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to resist him in front, ran all along the depth of Asdrubal his battell: and falling upon the skirts thereof, disordered the Enemies, and put all to rout. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on every fide, the greatest part was slaine. The Ligurians and Gaules escaped as they could; and faved themselves by timely slight. Of the Elephants, foure were taken alive: the rest were flaine: some by the Enemies weapons, others by their owne guides that rode them. For when any of them, being fore wounded, began to waxe unruly, and rush to backe upon their owne battels following them, the guide had in readinesse a Mallet, and a Chizzell, wherewith he gavethem a stroke between the eares, in the joynt of the neck, next unto the head, wherewith he killed the beaft upon the fudden. This speedy way of preventing such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the squadrons following them, is faid to have bin the device of Afdrubal himselfe, who dyed in this battell.

Great commendations are given to Asdrubal, both by Folybius and by Livie. He is faid at all times to have shewed himselfe worthy of Amilear his father, and Hannibal his brother: to have striven with great patience against many difficulties, whereinto hee 460

fell by the meanes of those Captaines that were sent from Carthage into Spaine; to have performed in this last battell all duties of a worthy Generall; and finally, when he faw the losse irrepaireable, to have ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where fighting bravely, he was flaine. Of the number that died with him in this battell, the report of Livie, and of Polybius doevery much disagree. For Livie saith, that the Carthaginians had no lesse an overthrow, than was that which they gave to the Romans at Canze; that fiftie fixe thousand of them were flaine, five thousand and foure hundred taken prisoners, and above foure thousand Roman citizens, whom they had captives with them. delivered, and fet at libertie. He faith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were flaine eight thousand: and of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; not only in o- to ther kindes, but in gold and filver. Concerning the bootie, Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is to have bin as rich as Livie reporteth it; for Asdrubal came well stored with mony. But Polybius (who had no defire to make this battell of Metaurus, a parallel unto that of Canna) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Caribag inian side, and two thousand of the Roman, to have bin slaine. The number of the prisoners he doth not mention: but only faith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken alive; and that all the rest died in the battell. Whereby it may seem that they were all Barchines: forafmuch as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their country, above their

The joy of this victory was no leffe in Rome, than had bin the feare of the event. For 10 ever fince it was knowne in what fort Nero had left his Army, the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his comming thither. Men thought it strange that the Confull should make such a great adventure, as thus to put the one half of all the Roman forces unto hazzard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to have notice of this his departure, and either pursue him, or set upon the Army that staid behind, much weakned, and without a Generall ? Thus did they talk; yet referving their censure unto the fuccesse; with liberty to approve or condemne, according to the issue. In the meane time the people filled the Market-place, the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counfell, waiting fill ready at hand upon the Magistrates, as if some great matter were dikely to fall out, that would aske every ones to help. In briefe, they were all fofull of melancholy, that when the first newes of victory came, there were not many that would beleeve it. Afterwards, when Messengers arrived from the Confuls, with Letters containing all that had passed, there was not onely great and joyfull concourse of all forts of men unto the Temples, but the very face of the City was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their private businesse; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborn to do) and attending their own affaires in such wise, as if Hamibal were already driven out of Italy.

Nero returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Afdrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African prifoners bound, fent two of them loofe to give Hamibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might have served 40 wellenough to certifie Hannibal of the mil-adventure, without doing wrong to the dead body of Afdrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and sarre different manner, had given buriall to Gracchus and Marcelliu; yea, to all the Roman Generals, whose carkasses fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howsoever the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their love unto the Common-weale: yet in dealing with enemies, they were far more civill, and leffe prone to the infolency of revenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that he hoped much more by the fudden terrour of fuch a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deepe impression of feare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That hee forgot himselfe, being 50 over-joyed with the greatnesse of his prosperity. For it was the battell of Metaurus that weighed downe the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebbe, ceased not afterwards to slow, till it could not bee contained within any banks. Hannibal having loft in this unhappy fight (befides that worthy Gentleman his brother) all the hope that fo long sustained him in Italie, with-drew himselfe into the Country of the Brusans: and thither he caused all the Lucans, that were of his partie, to remove; as likewise all that dwelt in Metaponium. For hee wanted men to defend to many places as he held at the prefent, because they lay too farre asunder-Where-

Wherefore he drew them all into a leffer compaffe in the utmost corner of Italy, it being a country of much fastnesse, and the people exceedingly devoted to his service. In this businesse Nere gave him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too firong for him, having all his forces united or because it is likely that this remove of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their harvest was vathered in : at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Livius the other Conful tarried among the Cifalpine Gaules untill the end of furnmer; there to fer things in fuch order as he thought requifite: which done, he wrote unto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Army in that Province, but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, he defired leave to returne home; and that he might bring his Army with him. The Senate well understood his meaning: which was, to have the honour of triumph, as he well deferved. But forasimuch as it was well knowne, what interest Nero had in the lare victory: order was given, that not onely Livie with his Armie should come home ; but likewise Nero, though leaving his Armie behind him, to confront Hamibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pompe whereof, Livie made the greater shew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; because in his Province. and upon his day of command, the victory was gotten: his Annie also being present at the triumph. But Nero, that rode on horfe-backe, and without fuch attendance, was the more extolled by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victory was in a manner wholly ascribed unto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturian Philo, and Q. Custling Metellin, Lievtenants to the Generals, the due acknowledgement of their good fervices For they were commended unto the People, as men worthy to be chosen Confuls ; and Confuls they were chosen for the yeere following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memory in their Confulthip. Neither indeed from this yeare, which was the thirteenth of the present warre, untill the eighteenth yeere wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italy; fave only the taking of Local from the Carthaginians by furprife. For Hannibal wanted ftrength, wherewith to make any great offer; and the Romans had little minde to provoke him; but thought it well that he was quier. Such opinion had they conceived of him, that though all about him went to ruo ine, yer in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold himselfe upright. And furely very notable are the commendations given unto him by Polybin, whom Livit therein followes: That making war upon a People, of all other the most warlike he obtained to many victories by his own good conduct: and that leading an Army, compounded offo many fundry nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gunls, Carthaginians, Italians, & Greeks, which were neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another ; he held them all in fuch good order, that they never fell to fedition among themselves, or against their Generall. But that which Livie adds hereto, is yet perhaps of greateradmiration: That he fultained his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, upon the hungry foile of the Brucians: which, when it was best manured 40 in time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparent, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Armie in fuch order and obedience, rather than by any greatnesse of reward and bootie: since, after the death of Astrubal, hee made no invasion upon the vvealthier parts of Italy; but held himself still among the poor Brutians Where we must leave him, untill he be drawn into Africk by Somis; whose doings will henceforth entertaine, and lead us unto theend of this War.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman made entire conquest of Spaine.

†. I.

How the Carthaginians were driven by Scipio from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

Age and Afdrubal the fon of Gesto, took upon them the charge of Spain, when Asdrubal the sonne of Amilear departed thence into Italy. These agreed toge-Inher that Mago should make a voyage to the Baleares; there to levie a supply of men: and Afdrubal with-draw himselfe into Lustiania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill means to follow; being altogether unacquainted in those parts. Mago had soone ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: where he met with one had soone ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: where he met with one so had soone ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: where he met with one so had soone ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: where he met with one of Hanno (the same perhaps that had lately bin imployed in Sicil) who brought new forces out of Africk, and came to succeed in place of Astrubal the Barchine. It is not unlikely that Spaine was now the better, and more readily surnished with men, and all things ly that Spaine was now the better, and more readily surnished with men, and all things was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approve it was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approve it such that noble race of Warriours; when it should appear, that things did prosper such the better by being left unto the handling of other men. Whether it were upon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether upon considence fire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether upon considence in the forces that he brought over: Hanno took the field, and led Mago with him; as purions afresh to set upon the Romans. So he entred into the country of the Celuberians, posing afresh to set upon the Romans. So he entred into the country of the Celuberians, not very far from new Carthage: where, by mony, and other persuasions, he levied above nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the meane while contained himselfe in the Easterne parts of Spaine: attentive, as it may seeme, to the proceedings of Asdrubal, the some of Amilear; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to have sent part of his forces into Italie, to the affistance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius the Consuls. But hearing of the levie made by Hanno and Mago among the Celiberians, he sent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten 20 thousand foot, and five hundred horse. Syllanus gor intelligence by some fugitive Celtiberians, who became his guides, that their Countrimen incamped apart from the Carthaginians ingreat disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neer to these Celiberians: and falling upon them on the sudden, gave them such an overthrow, that Hanno and Mago comming to their succour, in stead of heartening and re-inforcing them, became partakers of the losse. Mago faved himselfe with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand : and intendayes journey brought them safe to Asdrubal. The rest of the Africans were either slaine or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill lucke to be taken prisoner; though he kept himself out of the fight untill all was lost. As for the Celibe- 30 rians, they knew better how to make shift; and saved most of themselves by running into

It could no otherwise be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italy stood, by the comming thither of Afdrubal. Ten thousand foot, and eighteen hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spain (as it is reported by some Authors) to the defence of his owne Countrie; or was perhaps about to fend them: and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intentive to the necessitie and successe of his Countrimen at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of the Summer, then might he well adventure, to take in hand the entire conquest of Spain; which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the 40 report of fuch an overthrow. The Spanish Souldiers that served under Hannibal, and those that had bin sent over into Africke, were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Country was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noised abroad, that all which had followed Afdrubal into Italie, were falleninto the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his army was closed up in a streight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behove the Spaniards to conform themselves unto the will of the Victors. That it was the fuccesse of things in Italy, which gave such considence unto Scipios it is the more probable, because he tooke not this great enterprise in hand, untill the Summer was almost spent. Asarubal therefore used the benefit of the season; and by dispofing his Army into many Garrisons, hindered the Enemy from doing any great exploit 50 before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the yeere, caused Scipio to return back: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L, Scipio took by affault the Town of Oringis.

Against the next yeers danger, Astrabal prepared a great Army: and spared not cost, nor travell, in strengthening himselse, for the triall of his last fortune in Spaine. With seventy thousand foot, sourethousand horse, and two and thirty Elephants, he tooke the seventy thousand foot, sourethousand horse, and two and thirty Elephants, he tooke the seventy thousand foot, sourethousand horse, and two and thirty Elephants, he tooke the seventy thousand foot, source that he could hardly have raised, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italy. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too too weake to incounter with fuch a multitude. Wherefore he judged it needfull to use the helpe of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Uncle, that were cast away by the treason of such false Auxiliaries, made him on the other side very doubtfull. of relying upon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest need. Yet since one colchas, that was Lord of eight and twenty towns, had promifed him the last Winter, to raife three thousand foot, and five hundred horse for his service: he resolved to make nse of those, and some few others, that might helpe to make a shew; and yet not be able to doeany great harme, if they would revolt. So with five and forty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, he sought out the Enemy; neere unto whom he no incamped. At his first comming, Mago and Masanissa fell upon him; with hope to take him unprepared, whilest he was making his lodgings. But he layd certaine troupes of horse in covert: which, breaking upon them unexpected, caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly retrait: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly betooke them selves to plaine flight. After this incounter, which added some courage to the Romans, and abated the prefumption of the Carthaginians, there were daily skirmishes between the horse and light armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Astrubal drew forth his Armie, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to shew that he durst fight, yet not proceeding any farther. Thus they continued many dayes: Afdrubal being still the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that, in the evening, withdrew himselfe into his Trenches. The Spanello Auxiliaries were placed on both fides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midst, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at farre distance, many dayes together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same forme; and be matched on each part, with the enemies long before defigned. But Scipio, when he purposed indeed to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and withall, came forthearlier than he had beene wont. He caused his men and horses to be well fedde betimes in the morning before day: and then sent forth his horse aand light armature, to traine out the Carthag mians with their bellies empty: using herein the fame trick, whereby he might remember that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battell of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards in the battell. Asdrubal sent forth his horse in all haste, to entertaine the Romans; whilest he himfelfe arranged his men, in their wonted order at the Hill foot, upon which he incamped. In the skirmishes of the horse it could not be discerned which part had the better: fince, being over-pressed on either side, they had a safe retrait unto their foot: and one troupe seconding another by course, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his men, having well fed themselves, were like to hold out better than the Enemie. But about noone he caused his wings to advance a good pace; leaving their battell of Spaniards farre behind them, that came on leisurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercenaries that stood in Asarabal his wings, were no way comparable, fave onely in number, to the Latine and Roman Souldiers, that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, levied in haste; and fighting onely in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke, at the same time, by the Roman Velites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheele about for the same purpose, they were forely pressed; and with much difficultie made resistance. The Carthaginians would faine have succoured them; but that they durst not stir out of their places, because of the spanish battell which was comming against them; though it were as yet farre off. Thus the best part of Asdrubal his Armie stood idle, untill the wings were broken. For, had he adventured to meet with the Spaniards, hee must have cast himselse into the open space that lay before him betweene the Roman wings: to the depth whereof when he had arrived, he should have found himselfe inclosed in such fort, as was the Consull Paulus at the battell of Canna. Wherefore hee did onely imploy his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harme to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could nolonger be ruled by their guides: but ran, as chance led them, and troubled both Parts; or those perhaps the more, that were the more unwilling to kill them. In proceffe of the fight, the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured lustie; when the others began to faint with travell and heate of the day. Where464

Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed it the more horly; and gave not over, till they had fore the enemy to change his place, and run from him. Afdrubal did his best to have made an orderly retrait; and afterward againe, to have caused his men turn head at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not fuffer the victory to be so extorted from them: neither was it casie to put fresh courage into the vanquished, led by the obstinate passion of seare, which hearkens to no perswasion. The Camp of Asarubal had that day bin taken, if a ftorm of rain, which fell violently on the fudden, and bred fome fin-persition in the Romans, had not caused them to give over. The fame night Afdrabal gave no rest to his men: but caused them, hungry, and over-laboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe; wherein he feared to 10 be affaulted. But little affurance could he have in the strength of his Trenches, when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his subjects: many followed this example; and soone after two strong Townes were yeelded up to Scipio, and the Garrisons betrayed. It seemes that the perverse fortune of this late battell, whereupon Asdrubalhad set his rest, bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to believe the more easily those reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they never did good office to the Carthaginians. Asdrubal, perceiving this, withdrew himselfe, and marched away safler than an ordinary pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning, and overtaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them so often to make stand, that 10 they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruell flaughter: for there was no refistance made, but all fell to rout, fave onely seven thousand that with Asdrubal himself recovered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in haste. The place he made shift a while to defend but wanting there necessaries to sustain himfelf long he was for faken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he resolved to make shift for one; and stealing from his Company by night away to the Sea fide, that was not farrethence, he tooke shipping, and fet faile for Gades. When Scipio understood that Asdrubal was thus gone, he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, to be siege their Campe (which was not takeninhaste, for Mago and Masamila staid init) whilest he with the rest of the Army 30 did what was needfull in the Countrie abroad. It was not long ere Mago and Masamila followed Afdrubal to Gades: and their Army dispersed it selfe; some flying over to the Romans, others taking what way they liked. So upon all the Continent of Spaine, there were only three Towns left, Illiurgi, Castulo, and Astapa, that made continuance of war against the Romans: of which only Castulo had a Carthaginian garrison, consisting of such as had saved themselves by slight in the late overthrows. Hereby it seems, that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Castulo yeelded long since unto the Romans; though Hannibal took a wife in that Citie. For this was one of the last three towns that held out on the Carthaginian fide. Illiturgi had fomtimes bin inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their devotion. Yet after the death of the two elder 40 Serpio's, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune, it not only rebelled, but with great cruelty betrayed and flue the poor men that escaped thither from the overthrows. Astapa was a town that still adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worse, had thriven by the spoyle of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though notuntill the next year) Scipio went against these and tooke himselfe Illiturgi and Castulo: Illiturgiby affault, and with a generall flaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdubellus, Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcius or rather destroied by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raifed in the Market-place: whereinto was thrown all the gold, and filver, with what soever else was precious; the vvomen and children standing by it under a fure guard, that should kill and burne them if the Romans got into the Town. 50 This provision being made, all the Inhabitants that could beare Armes, rushed forth desperately, and sell upon the Roman Camp; where striving beyond their power, they vvere every one flain. Then was the Town forth-with fet on fire, by those that had taken charge to do it: and many of the Romans confumed with the flame; whileft they rushed over-hastily to catch the gold and filver, which they saw lying on the pile ready

Astrubal being beaten into the Iland of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with feven Gallies: leaving Mago behind him, to wait upon occasion, if any should be offered. He visited in his way home, Syphan, King of the Malafili, a people of the Numidians; hoping to win him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio as it were with his evill Angel, in the Kings port: who landing at the fame time, carried Syphan quite another way. For Scipio having driven the Carthaginians out of Spain, did forth-with bethink himself, how to finish the War, by putting them to the like distresse in Africk. Hereunto it seemed that the help of Syphan would be much availeable: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and fustained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might eafily be moved to feek revenge. He had also bin beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that fent him over a Captain o into Africk; who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Upon these reasons, the Numedian King sent Embassadors to Rome and made league with the city in time of great extremity. So that hereby P. Scipio conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the War, which he intended in Africk, upon the friendship of this ill neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent over C.La. lius his Embaffador to deale with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did vervill in Italy, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spaine, eafily perfwaded the King to take part with those that had the better, and were without question his better friends. Only Syphax requested that the Roman Generall should visite him in person, to conclude the League; by which he was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any o former Treaty. Hereto Scipio condescended; thinking the friendship of so great a King. that was neighbour to Carthage, and not far distant from Spaine, well worthy of the adventure. So with two Quinquereme Gallies he took Sea, and arrived in the Kings Port, at the fame time with Afdrubal. This would have been very dangerous to him, had he been descried by his enemies further at Sea: but in the Haven they forbare to make offer one upon the other. Syphax might well be proud; seeing at one time, two such Captains of two most powerful Cities, came to desire his friendship. He would have brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excused himselfe, by want of such Commission from the Senare. He feasted them together : and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into Covenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

Funerall games held by Scipio. A Duell between two Spanish Princes. A digression concerning Duels.

Cipio returning into Spaine, and resting that Winter, took vengeance the next yeare, upon those of Illiturgi, Castule, and Astapa, as hathbin said before. The Conquest of the Country being then in a manner at an end; he performed at new Carthage, with great folemnity, some Vowes that he had made, and honoured the memory of his Father and Uncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at sharpe, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull that he should trouble himselfe with preparing flaves for that spectacle, to hazzard their lives, as was used in the City of Rome: for there were enow, that either offered themselves as Voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes, to give proofe in fingle combat, of the valour that was in their feverall Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to refer the decision of their Controversies, to tryall of the fword, in fingle fight. Among these, the most eminent, were Corbi and Orfua; Colen-germans: that contended for the principality of a Town called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers some: wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house, after the manner of our Irish Tanistry. But the father of Orsua stood lately seized of the principality: which, though himfelf received by the death of hiselder brother; yetthis his fon would not let it goe back, but claimed to hold it as heire unto his father, and old enough to rule. Fain would Scipio have compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends and kindred had already laboured in vaine, to take up that quarrell; and that neither God nor Man, but only Mars, their god of battell, hould be Umpire between them. So they had their wils : and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilfull at his weapon, easily vanquished the foole-hardinesse of the younger. Such

Such combats have been very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We reade of many performed before the Warre of Troy; by Thefeus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two more at the Warre of Troy, the one betweene Paris and Menelaus; the other betweene Hettor and ajax. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrewes: whereof that between David and Goliah; and others perfomed by some of Davids Worthies, against those that challenged them; are greatly celebrated. Unto the fame kinde appertained the fight betweene twelve of the Tribe of Juda, and as many of the Benjamites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principall, in which they ventured their Dominion upon the heads of three brethren the Horatii, against the three brethren, Curatii, that were Albans. The combat of 10 Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Corvinus, with two Champions of the Gaules, which challenged any Roman; were of leffe importance, as having only reference to bravery. In England there was a great Combat fought between Edmund Ironfide. and Canut us the Dane, for no leffe matter than the Kingdome. The use of them was very frequent in the Saxon times; almost upon every occasion, great or small. In the reigne of Edward the third, who sustained the party of Mountfort against the Earle of Blogs, contending for the Duchie of Britain; there was a fight for honor of the Nations, between thirty of the Britons, and thirty English: two of which English, were Calverlie, a brave Captain; and that Sir Robers Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French wars, and did highly honour his bloud, whereof the Lord Knolles is 20 descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French, and Italian Histories. Most of them have been combats of bravery, and of gayete de cour. as the French terme it; for honour of feverall Nations; for love of Miltreffes; or whatfoever else gave occasion unto men, desirous to set out themselves. But besides those of this fort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either upon accusation for life; or upon tryall of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kinde, was that, of which we spake even now, betweene Corbis and Orsua. Unto these (mee thinks) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat upon Wager; fuch as were that between David and Geliah, or that between the Horatii and Curatii: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one over the other, isad-30 ventured upon the head of Champions. Upon an acculation for life, there was a combat appointed between the Lord Henry of Boulinbrook, Duke of Hereford, and Moubray Duke of Norfolke. There was a combat performed by Sir John Angley and one Cattring-An.21. Kic. 2. ton: whom Ansley charged with treason: and proved it upon him, by being victorious. The like was fought betweene Robert of Mountfort, and Henry of Effex. The like also, An. 9. Henr . 2. between a Navarrois, and one Wellh of Grimiby, whom the Navarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that he had belyed him, and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our tryall by battell doe determine, that the falle accuser, ifhe be vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had beene due to the offender, if the accusation had beene proved; I cannot affirme. But wee every where finde, That 40 if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customes of Normandy, of Murder, Rape, or burning of places (offences punished by death) be overcome, He shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for tryall of right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but he may try it by his Champion, as did Paramour and Low, or offered to doe, in the reigne of Queen Elizabeth. And in this case, he that is beaten or yeeldeth, loseth onely his cause, not his life. Neither are the combats upon acculation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of bravery; but in Campe close, that is, within railes. Now this eryall by combat was so ordinary in France, before the time of S. Lewis and Philip the faire his grand-child, as every Lord of Fee, Ecclefiafticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Jurif- 50 diction. And it seemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Memorialls of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken up, each of the parties should pay two shillings sixe pence; but if it were performed, then should the party vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelve shillings. And upon this custome grew the French Proverbe, which they use when as any man hath had an hard and unjust judgement; faying, That Hee was tryed by the Law of Loray, or Berne; ou le battu paye l'amende, where he that is beaten gives the recompence. Of these frequent trials by battell that great learned man Tvo, Bishop of Chartres, did often complaine, and specially against the French Church-men: as appeares by * his Letters to the Bishop of *clericiveshi ne. orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Archbishop of Sens, and to others; peradnosroverwhereinherebukes the judgement of their Churches, that had ratified fuch challenges comitis Theorem of combat. But this liberty and kinde of tryall, was retrencht by S. Lewis, and Philip the baldi Aureliafaire; so that no man could decree or grant it, save the King himselfe. It hath since been reinfernations, granted, though more sparingly, by the French Kings, as to the Lord of Carognes, against quad quidam mi-Jaques le Gris; and to Julian Romero the Spaniard, against Moro his countriman: wherein dulphi quendam Sir Henry Knevet, Father to the Lord Knevet now living, was Patron to Romero that had militan Comitis the victory; and lastly to the Lord of Chast. Now in those challenges, upon accusation an provocaverit, of Treason, Murder, or other offence deserving death (and in those onely) the rule held, & have provoca-That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ces dessences par un dementir ; The descendant was tionem Ecclesse bound to plead not guilty, by giving the accuser the Lie : otherwise it was concluded, that confirmateria. the Defendant did tailiblement confesser le crime : filently confesse the crime. But after such oc. time as Francis the French King, upon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie unto the Emperor Charles the fift, thereby to draw him to a personall combat: every petty Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made giving of the Lie mortality it felf, holding it a matter of no finall glory to have it faid. That the meanest Gentleman in France would not put up, what the great Emperor Charles the fift had patiently

o endured. From this beginning is derived a challenge of combat, grounded upon none of those occasions that were knowne to the Ancient. For the Honour of Nations, the Tryall of Right the Wager upon Champions, or the Objection and Refutation of capital offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of halfe fo many Duels, as are founded upon meere private Anger, yea, or upon matter feening worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duellifts. So that in these daies, wherein every man takes unto himfelfe a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint personal combats, the giving of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation onely in accusations for life, is become the most fruitfull root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word fo terrible, and a wrong fo unpar-30 donable, as will admit no other recompence, than the bloud of him that gives it. Thus the fashion, taken up in haste by the French Gentlemen, after the pattern of their King, is growne to be a cultome: whence we have derived a kinde of Art and Philosophie of quarrell; with certainegrounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yeathere are (among many no leffe ridiculous) fome fo mysticall curiosities herein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour, to receive from an enemy a flighttouch with a Cane, than a found blow with a Sword: the one having relation to a flave, the other to a fouldier. I confesse that the difference is pretty: though formy owne part, if I had had any fuch Italianated enemy in former times, I should willingly have made with him fuch an exchange; and have given him the point of honour to boot.

But let us examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiving it. I say that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that give it them; use nothing so much in their conversation and course of life, as to speake and sweare falfly. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, having affumed and fworn to pay the monies & other things they borrow, doe not breake their word and promise as often as they ingage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Lyers by Record, by being fued in some Court or other of Justice, upon breach of word or bond ? For he which hath promised that he will pay mony by a day, or promised any thing else, wherein he faileth; hath directly lyed to him to whom the promise hath been made. Nay, what is the profession of love that men make now-a-daies . What is the vowing of their fervice, and of all they have, used in their ordinary complements, and (in effect) to every man whom they bid but good morrow, or falute, other than a courteous and Court-like kinde of lying! It is (faith a wife French man, deriding therein the Apish custome of his Country) un marche & complot fait ensemble, se mocquer, mentir, & piper les uns les autres; A kind of merchandi le, and complet made among them, to mocke, belie, and deride each other: and so farrenow-a-daies in fashion, and in use; as he that useth it not, is accounted either dull or Cynicall. True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinction) that there is great difference betweene these mannerly and complementall lies, with those which are fometime perswaded by necessity upon breach of promise; and those which men use out of cowardize and feare: the latter confessing themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other stiled the most villanous. But now for the Lieit selfe, as it is made the subject of all our deadly quarrels in effect: to it I say, That who soever giveth another man the Lie, when it is manifest that he hath lied, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more hainoufly taken, than to tell him, he hath broken any promife which he hath otherwise made. For he that promiseth any thing, tels him, to whom he hath promised, that he will performe it; and, in not performing it, hee had made him felse a Lier. On the other side, He that gives any man the Lie, when he himselse knowes that he, to whom it is given, hath not lied; doth therein give the Lie directly to himfelfe. And what cause have I, if I say that the Sunne shines when it doth shine, and that another fellow tels me I lie, for it's mid-night; to profecute fuch an one to death, for making himselse a foolish Ruffian, and a lyer in his owne knowledge ? For he that gives the Lie in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyalty, or Life; gives it impertinently, and Ruffian-like. I will not deny but it is an extreme rudenesse to taxe any man in publike with an untruth (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice against whom the untruth is uttered:) but all that is rude, ought not to bee civillized with death. That were more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and 20 to follow the counsell of God. But you will fay, that these discourses savour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize to feare God or hell: whereas he that is truely wise, and truely valiant, knowes that there is nothing else to be feared. For against an Enemies fword, we shall finde ten thousand seven-peny-men (waged at that price in the wars) that feare it as little, or perchance leffe, than any profest Sword-man in the world. Diligentissima intutela sui Fortitudo; Fortitude is a diligent preserver of it selfe. It is faith Aristotle) a mediocrity betweene doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem pæna : sic nec fortem pugna; sed causa: As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr: so it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good cause. In which, who soever fhall refolvedly end his life, refolvedly in respect of the cause, to wit, in desence of his 30 Prince, Religion, or Country: as he may justly beenumbred among the Martyrs of God; fo may those that die with malicious hearts, in private combats, be called the Martyrs of the Divell. Neither doe we indeed take our owne revenge, or punish the injuries offered us, by the death of the injurious. For the true conquest of revenge is, to give him, of whom we would be revenged, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death upon our owne consciences; Animasa; in vulnere ponere; And to drowne our foules in the wounds and bloud of our enemies. Hereupon you will again aske me, if I condemne, in generous and noble spirits, the defence of their honours, being prest with injuries ? I say that I doe not, if the injuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the Eternall Law: and the Lawes of all Christian Kings and 40 States; doe favour him that is affailed, in the flaughter of the affailant. You will fecondly aske me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Cartel by one of like quality, be not bound in point of honour to satisfie the chalenger in private combat ! I answer, that he is not : because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrary and opposite to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion over it, which can judge it, which can destroy it ; except you will stile those Acts honourable, where the Hang-man gives the Garland. For, feeing the Lawes of this Land have appointed the Hang-man to fecond the Conqueror, and the Lawes of God appointed the Divell to fecond the Conquered, dying in malice: I fay, that he is bothbase and a fool, that accepts of any Cartel so accom- 50 panied. To this perchance it will be answered, That the Kings of England, & other Christian Kings, have seldome taken any such advantage over men of quality, who upon even termes have slaine their private enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they have not often done it; so did our Noble-men and Gentlemen in former ages, in all important injuries, fueunto the King, to approve themselves by battell and publique combat. For as they dared not to brave the Law; fo did they difdaine to submit themselves unto the shamefull revenge thereof; the same revenge (because it detesteth murder) that it hath declared against a common Cut-purse or other Theeves:

Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for fuch offenders: Yet is not the manflayer freed by his pardon. For these two remedies hath the party grieved notwithstanding; that is, to require justice by Grand Assize, or by battell, upon his appeale, which (faith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denyed; and he further faith (for I use his owne words) Sir Thomas That if the Defendant (to wit, the man-flayer) be convinced either by great Affize or by Comwealth Battell, upon that appeale; the man-flayer shall dye notwitstanding the Princes pardon. of England. So favourable (faith the fame learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the law of our Realme, to justice and to the punishment of bloud violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble-men and Gentlemen shall be repaired in honour, where an e-10 nemy, taking the start either in words or blowes, shall lay on them an infamy unsufferable . I fay, that a Marshals Court will easily give satisfaction in both. And if we hold it no disgrace to submit our selves for the recovery of our Debts, Goods, and Lands, and for all things else by which the lives of our selves, our wives, and children are sustained, to the Judges of the Law; because it may be felony to take by violence even that which is our owne: why should we not submit our selves unto the Judges of honour in cases of honour; because to recover our reputation by strong hand, may be murder? But yet againe, it may be objected, That the loffe of honour ought to be much more fearefull unto us, than either the loffe of our goods, of our lands, or of our lives; and I fay force But what is this honour, I meane honour indeed, and that which ought to be so deare 20 unto us, other than a kinde of history, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficulty or danger, and undertaken for the publike good ? In these, he that is imployed and trufted, if he faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he loseth his honour. But the acting of a private combat, for a private respect, and most commonly a frivolous one, is not an action of vertue, because it is contrary to the Law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is it difficult, because even and equall in persons and armes: Neither for a publike good, but tending to the contrary; because the losse or mutilation of an able man, is also a losse to the Common-weale.

Now that a Marshall of England hath power to fave every mans fame and reputation, 30 as farre as reputation may fustaine injury by words, I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent us of any evill words that wee have given, and to confesse that we have done him wrong, unto whom we have given them, is a fufficient fatisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For he that gives ill words in choler, and suddenly denies them, or repents himselfe of them upon advisement, hath the disadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeed not to be given but to those that are servile, whether sufficient recompence will be made for them, it shall appeare by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Monsier de Plessis, that was stricken in France not long fince by a Baron of the fame Nation. The fatisfaction which was given him by a judgement of the Constable and Marshals of France, was this. In the open o Court, wherein the Constable gave judgement, M.de Plessis was set in a chaire under the degrees where the Constable and Marshals sate : the Baron, who had given him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a fword with the point towards himfelfe, and in his left hand the like cudgel or baftinado, wherewith he had stricken M. de Plessis; both which weapons he delivered into Plessis hands, submitting himselfe to such revenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons; the Constable and Marshalls having formerly left it to the will of Plessis, to use his owne discretion in the revenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himselfe, as one beforehand in point of honour, (who struck M. de Plesse like a Ruffian comming behind him, and having the advantage of company, and his o horses ready, shifted himselse away on the sudden; but being afterwards taken, was taught to repent himselfe in this shamefull manner:) or whether Monsier de Plessis (of whose valour no man doubted) had not farre juster cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure have beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgave him: let any wise man Judge. To this, if it be faid, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission, that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntary; and therefore no difgrace unto him. I answer, that one may say as well, that it is no difference to a Theese, when he is brought to the Gallowes, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no disgrace in respect of a force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our fins to God) makes all repenrance shamefull; because all forced repenrance is insticted upon us for somewhat unworthy of a Gentleman, and of an honest man. Nay, voluntary repentance it selfe, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the searc of the ill that may befall us, or out of the acknowledgement of our own weaknesse. Certainly, as wise men, and valiant men do rather deride petty injuries or fudden injuries, that are not offered from malice fore-thought, than revenge them: fo men, apt to quarrell, do commonly suspect their own valour; and rather defire, that thereby the world should believe them to be of great daring, than know any fuch resolution in themselves. For he that knowes himselfe indeed to be an honest man, scornes to hunt after opinion.

Now the fame power which the Constable and Marshals of France have, hath also a Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose judgement, in all disputes of honour, every mans reputation may be preferred; we may therefore as well submit our selves to the Judge of honour in all diffutes of honour, as we do fubmit our felves in all controverfies of livelihood and life, to the Judges of the Law. And, our of doubt, the institution of this Court of Chevalrie in England, in France, and elsewhere; was no lesse charitable than politike. For the bloud of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth bony bees, as that of Bulls doth, which sting but the fingers or the face : but it produceth that monstrous beast, Revenge, which hath stung to death, and eaten up, of severall Nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatning the wrath of 20 God upon supreme Governours, than the permission.

His Majesty therefore (which Henry the fourth of France also endeavoured) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deed in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predeceffors could never doe: in beating downe and extinguishing that hereditary profecution of malice, called the deadly fend; a conquest, which shall give him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power for evermore. And we have cause to hope, that his royall care shall be no lesse happy in preventing the like mischiefe, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and brave, yet outragious vanity of Duellifts. Unto this that I have spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must be eadded, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproofe and vengeance proportiona- 30 bly, more or lesse, in their severall degrees. There is much difference betweene Lies of necessity upon breach of promise; or complementall lyes; and such pernicious lyes, as proceed from feare and cowardize, or are uttered by false witnesses: the former fortbeing excusable by weaknesse or levitie; the latter being altogether detestable. No lese, if not more, difference there is, betweene killing of a man in open field, with even weapons; & that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per infidias; though our Lawes doe not much diftinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his owne priviledge, commandeth that the guilefull murderer be drawn by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is every guilefull murder performed by the fword, nor by evert violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by poysoning ; and by 40 the pen, or by practice. For fuch diffinction is found, betweene comming prefumptuoutly upon a man, to flay him with guile; and lying in wait for bloud, privily, for the innocent, without a cause, upon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the birds . Frances the first, Queene Mary of England, and the Kings Majesty now reighing, have given notable testimony of their justice, upon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis upon the Lord of Talard: who being (faith the French Historian) de haute & uncienne lignee, & supporté de plusieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient linage, and supported by divers great alliances, of which the Cardinall of Bellay (in especiall favour with the King) was one, was notwithstanding delivered over into the hands of the Hangman. Queen Mary, 50 upon a noble man of her owne Religion, and in many other respects very deare unto her. His Majesty, upon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no lesse ancient and faithfull, than himselfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poylon, and of purulhment following such wicked Artisans, every age hath had too many examples. Of killing guilefully by the pen (that I may not speake of any Englifb Judge) the Author of the French Recherches gives unto us two notable infrances:

the one of des Elbury, who (faith Pasquier) fit mourir Montaign grand Maistre de France,

il fut pendu & estrangle; who caused Montaigu great Master of France to die to content his mind (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Eshars worshipped as his Idol: but God permitted, that he himselfe was soone after hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first upon his Chancellor Foyer: who to satisfie the Kings passion. practifed the destruction of the Admirall Chabor; a man most nobly descended, and of great fervice. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of love growes old, and weares out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, he charged him with some offences which he had formerly committed. The Admirall, presuming upon the great good fervice which he had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Marfeilles against the Emperour, gave the King other language than became him; and defired nothing fo much, as a publike trial! Hereupon the King (it being eafie to provoke an ill disposition) gave commission to the Chancellor, as President, and other Judges, upon an information of the Kings advocate, to question the Admirals life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large conscience, (which is not rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with fome of the Judges with fo great cunning; with others, with fo sharpethreats; and with the rest, with so fair promises; as albeit nothing could be proved against the Admiral, worthy of the Kings displeasure, ver the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Offices. and Liberty; though not able to prevaile against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward(the king hating falfhood in fo great a magistrate) other than his own degradation. arraignment, and condemnation? Belle leçon certes (faith Pasquier) à tout Juge pur demeurer toussours en soy, & ne lasser fluttuer sa conscience dedans les vagues d'une imaginare faveur, qui pour fin de jeu le submerge ; A faire lesson to all Judges, to dwell alwayes in themselves, and not to suffer their consciences to float upon the waves of imaginarie favour, which in the end overwhelmes them. And as for the Admirallsthough it might have bin answered unto his friends, if any bewailed his calamitie as undeferved, That he was trved according to his owne defire, by the Lawes of his Country, and by the Judges of Parliament; yet the Kings justice, surmounting all other his passions, gave back unto him his Honour, his Offices, his Liberty, and his Estate.

t. III.

The last Ads of Scipio in Spain. His return to Rome, where he is chosen Consul.

He last businesse that troubled Scipio in Spain, grew by the rebellion of the people, and muriny of his fouldiers. He fell dangerously fick, in such fort, that the rumor of his death ran current throughout Spain. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, petty kings, that had for faken the Carthaginians, & followed Scipio a while beforesto take arms against the Romans. They were vainly perswaded, that after the Carthaginians were driven out, they themselves should become the might iest in all Spain. But feeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatnesse of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present advantage, and hammer out their owne fortunes. So they rashly fell upon the Suessetani and Sedetani, Confederates of the Romans; and wafled their Country. Part of the Roman Army lying at Sucro, in flead of making head against these Rebels, grew to be affected with the like distemper. They had not reaped such profit of the Roman conquests, as might fatisfie their desires; or as they thought easie to be gotten, if they might be their owne Carvers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought, that the time ferved very well, to enrich themselves with the spoyle of the Country. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatelt of all, driving away their Colonels, that should have bridled their furie; they chose out of their owne number two base fellowes, Albin Calenn, and Airin umber, to their Commanders. These tooke upon them all the Ensignes of Proconsuls, or Propretors; as if this their election had been like to that, wherein Lucius Martin was chosen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipio's. But whileft they were deviling what exploits they might doe, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such combustion as yvas expected; there arrived more certain newes, that Scipio vvas both alive, and ingood health. There came also new Colonels, sent unto them from their Generall: vvho mildly rebuking their vyant of confideration, and feeming to be glad that they had no further over-shot themselves; led them to Carthagena, there to receive their pay. Before their comming, Scipio had refolved to doe exemplary justice on the principal offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in fear of what they had deferved. Therefore he caused Syllanus to make ready the Companies which lay before in the Town, as it were to make an Expedition against Mandonius and Indibilis: he caused Albius and Airius with some thirty other of their Complices, to be fecretly apprehended in their lodgings; he called the Mutiners to affembly; and having them unarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his companies, prepared for the purpose; he bitterly inveighed against them all as Traitors. This done, Albim and Airim, with the other prisoners, were haled to the an as 1 rattors. 1 ins doile, 24.6. and beheaded, as was the Roman cuftome toward fuch of-fake; where they were whipt and beheaded, as was the Roman cuftome toward fuch offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were caused to take their oath of obedience anew; and received every man his pay when he was fworn.

Mandonius and Indibilis continued in arms; notwith standing that they had certain word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could have bin contented to be quiet: but by the feverity used to the Roman Souldiers, they stood in fear, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them, and found them in a Valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Army. In the entrance thereof he fought with them: and fending Lalius with all his horse to fetch a compasse about the hils, and charge them in rear, he overthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this, no hope remaining to preferve themselves and their estates, otherwise than by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio: and humbly craving pardon, both for himself and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves lesse free Princes, than formerly they had been.

Afterwards Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Masanissa; who secretly promifed to do him all service, if the people of Rome would fend him to make war in Africk. Unto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carihage, that letting all care of Spaine alone, he should thence depart with his fleet into Italy; and there wagean Army of Gaules and Ligurians, to joyn with Hannibal. For this purpose, was mony sent unto him from Caribage; and he himfelf laid hold upon all that he could find in the town of Gades; without sparing either private men, the common treasury, or the Temples. In 30 his voyage thence, he landed at Carthagena; hoping to have taken it by surprise. But he failed in the attempt; and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned back to repose himfelse a while at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoyle that he had made at his taking leave of them, would not fuffer him again to enter into their City. By this he foresaw, that it would not be long ere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Meffengers into the Town, to complain of this uncourteous dealing, he allured their Magiftrates forth unto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spain

The Isle and City of Gades, was yeelded to the Romans, presently after the departure 40 of Mago. Then did Scipio deliver up the Province, to those that were sent from Rome to fucceed him therein: and him felf with ten ships returned home. At his comming to Rome, he made fuit for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet bin granted unto no Proconful, excepting to fuch, as received that dignitie after a Confulfhip, as it were by prorogation. But, to make amends for this repulse, the election of new Confuls being then in hand, by generall voice of the citie P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Conful; and P. Licinius Crassus joyned with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans, might not, by the custome of those times, go far from the Citie; as being to intend the matters of their superstition : though Cafar, and others, who in ages following held the same office, were staied by no such religious impediment, from being far & long 5 absent. Hereby it came to passe, that Scipio, desiring to have the war transferred into Africk, was in no danger to lose that honorable charge, by any mischance of lot, in the divifion of Provinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment fo far off.

§. XVIII.

Scipio obtaines leave to make war in Africk. His preparations. Of Masatissa who was joyned with Scipio. The victories against Asdrubal and Syphax.

Dub. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Craffus, entring into their Confulship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio should be allowed, to bestow part of the mony which he had brought out of Spaine into the rreasurie; upon the setting forth of solemn plaies, that he had vowed to make, whilest he was bufied in his Spanish wars. This helped well to revive the memory of his victories already gotten; and to give hope unto the People of greater victories in the war, which he in ended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanello Embassages availe much in the Senate; especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions highly and deservedly; faying, That they were the most happy of all their countriemen, since they being present, had seen him chosen Conful, and should carry home such joy full news. The Saguntine Embaffadors were lovingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome (though costly it were both to them and to the Romans) had well deserved. Nevertheless, when Scipio proposed, that Africk might be decreed unto him for his Province, there wanted not many even of the principal men, that vehemently gain-faid him. Of these was o 2. Fabius Maximus the chiefe: who feems to have bin troubled with that difeafe, which too often causeth men, renowned for long approved vertue, to look asquint upon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kind. He alledged many reasons against the purpose of the Conful: whereof the chiefe were, That the treasurie was unable to sustain the charges of a war in Africk; and that it was extremely perillous to hazzard fo great forces, where they could not at pleasure be recalled unto the defence of Rome it selfe, if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy stood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his brother, that was arming the Liqurians: as also concerning the honour of the Conful; which would (he said) be greater in setting Italy free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harm to Afrack. Neither did he forboth to elevate the Spanish wars, as of lesse moment than the intended voyage against archage, nor withall to lay great blame upon Scipio, for having suffered Afdrubal to pass and Italy: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, lest the like might happen again; and that a new Army, notwithstanding the good successe of Scapio, (if it hapned to be good) mightbe sent from Carthage, to the utter endangering of Rome, whilest the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the main point which he urged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that yeer a Province: which the Conful neverthelesse propounded in such wife, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other fide, infifted upon this one point; That it was better to make an offensive, than a defensive war: especially against such as the Carthaginians, who being il provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves, by help of mony, withlevies made abroad. As for the care of Italy, he doubted not, but P. Licenius is Colleague would be as well able to difcharge it now, as others had done in times of ereater danger. So promifing to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his own home; and taxing as civilly as he could, the envie of Fabius, which with stood such a gallant enternife, he proposed the matter again to the Senate. Much altercation there was about the maner of his proceeding: for a finuch as it was noised abroad, that if he could not bring the renate to his mind, he would carry it by the people. This offended many of the Ancients: who refented in this honourable man, a little spice of that arrogancie, which in following ages grew to be much hotter, in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusi-On, Scipio referred himselfe wholly to the Senates good will and pleasure; whereby he Obtained thus much, That the Ile of Sicil might be appointed unto him for his Province; with leave to passe over into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voyage, made the Roman Senate have little care to furnish out Scipio to the war, by him intended upon Africk. Herewithall it fell Out, that Mago, comming on the sudden from the Baleares to Genua, and winning the Town, bred a feare of no leffe terrible invafion upon Italy, than that which Afdrub al had lately made. He could not indeed raise any great Army of the Ligurians: for that hee ^{to}und them diftracted with civill warres. Therefore he was driven to make choyfe of his partie; and to helpe those whom he thought fittest for his turne, against the others. This troublesome businesse, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly have spared: yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the unsteady Gauls ready to enter into his pay .Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that under Proconsuls, and Prætors, lay ready to be employed where need should require; were dire-Eted unto the borders of Lombardie and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a seet either comming to his aide from Carthage, or by him fent thither (the report is uncertaine) loaden with the booty that he had taken, fell into the hands of the Roman Prætor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much disable him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with 10 ftore of mony, heartning him in his proceedings; yet fome impediments which he found, and that fatall voyage of Scipio into Africke disturbed all; and made him be re-called Against Hannibal was nothing done this yeere. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Koman Historians have bin pleased to take notice. Onely it is said, that he fpent the Summer by the Temple of Juno Lacinia, where he raifed an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, graven in Punike and Greeke letters. Such accompt of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission and carelesnesses, in those that are upon the losing hand, a cause both of the fame for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they finde a notable change. A 20 great pestilence, insesting both the Carthaginian and the Roman Campe, is said to have been the occasion of this yeeres idlenesse; which fell out not much amisse for the Citie of Rome, that was marvellously impoverished by this warre; and had already tried the utmost way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieve the present necessitie, it was well thought upon, that a great part of Campania (not many yeeres since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargaine, that the Citie might receive no losse, the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, unto the detectors of lands

Of this, or other money, none was given to Scipio. Neither was he allowed to make presse of Souldiers for his African voyage; neither did he over-much labour to obtaine 30 it. That which the Senate refused, the people did for him: or rather they did it for themfelves; that were therein wifer than the Senate. It is usually found in Councels of estate, that the busie, or obstinate heads of a few, doe carry all the rest. And many times men make a furrender of their owne judgements, to the wisedome that hath gotten it selse a name, by giving happy direction introubles forepast. Therefore, he that reposeth himfelfe upon the advice of many, shall often find himselfe deceived: the counsell of those many being wholly directed by the Empire of a few, that over-fway the reft. 2. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his warie nature forted well with the bufinesse, that fell out in the chiefe of his employment. Unto him therefore 2. Fulviu adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne old in following one course; from which 40 they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well advise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needfull resolution of Scipio: in such sort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from divers parts of Italy about seven thousand Voluntaries. He had also provision from the severall Townes: Corne, Iron, Canvas for failes, Axes, Beed-hookes, Hand-mils, and the like implements; Firre for building of ships, many thousands of Targets, Helmets, and Speares of all kindes : every place furnishing him with that commoditie, which it best could af-

Unto this willingnesse of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compasse of five and forty dayes, he had both fell'd his Timber, built, and lanched 50 twentie Trireme, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith he transported his Army into Sicil. In Sicil he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had served at Canna: which were old Souldiers, and (as he himselfe well knew) not guilty of the overthrows for which they had long under-gone a heavie censure. They had served under Marcellus and Levinus, at the taking of many Cities and strong pieces: in which regard, they were like to be of good use to him in Africk, where would be store of such employment. For increasing the number of his horse, he pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthy young men, and fuch as loved well their ease. These heasterward discharged from the Warre, highly highly to their contentment: but with condition, that they should deliver their Horse and Arms, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought over with him for the purpose. Whilest he was providing to have things in a readinesse for Africk, the banished Locrians that followed the Roman fide, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recover their City . Some handicraftf-men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Locri, (for there were two in the Towne) being taken prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransomed and rewarded. Scipio being advertised of this, gave order to have the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadel was surprised. The other Citadel was strongly defento ded by the Carthaginian Garrison, which fent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like fort fearing lest their owne paticitie should make them too weake for Hannibal, craved helpe of the Conful Scipio. The Towns men were doubtfully affected but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out, whom the comming of Scipib caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carihaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custodie of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians unto the Roman Senate: not onely against those of the Garrison: but much more against Pleminius the Captaine, who gave bad example, and was worse than all the reft. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other villanies, the Temple of Pro-10 ferpina, that had a great fame of fanctitie, was spoyled by these barbarous Theeves. The Locrians therefore advised the Senate to make present amends to the goddesse for this facriledge: faying, that the like had never been committed, without notorious revenge by her taken upon the Authors. The Senate gave good eare to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redreffed the injuries done unto them; fent for Pleminius, with other principall offenders, whom they cast into prison, and used according to their deferts: as also they restored unto Proserpina her mony twice told. But old 2. Fabius was not herewithall contented. He laid much of the blame upon Scipio, that had placed fuch a man in Locri; and had not carefully hearkened to the complaints made against him. but suffered him to runne on in these his wicked courses. By the sharpe invective that 30 Fabim made, others tooke courage to speake what they pleased, as well against the demeanour of Scipio, as against the diffolutenesse of his Armie; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicil, neither mindefull of any service toward, nor fit for it is need should require. Finally, things were so far urged, that ten Legates were sent over into Sicil, together with the Prætor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ædiles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the Generall to returne into Italy, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was, they found him fo well prepared against Caribage, as that they hastned him on his journey, and gave him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had already employed Lalim in Africk; rather to make discovery, than to work any other greateffect of war. He took a great bootie: and strucke no little terrour into the Carthagimans; who saw their affaires to be upon terms of change. But the greatest fruit of his journy was, That speaking with Masanissa, he well informed himselfe of the state of Africk; and knew what was to be expected of those two Kings, that had promised to joyne with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masanissa his revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made under-hand with the Romans, Livie doth professe, That there was no such evident cause Livilba thereof at the present; but that the long continance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to prove, that this his change, was not without fome good cause. But Appianus (an Historian far inferiour to Livie, both in Worth and Time) gives 50 one reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessary truth. Onely the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe, that the knowledge of such a matter should have escaped the diligence of Livie, if it had been true: unlesse we should beleeve, that he wilfully forbare to rehearse a Tragedie; the forrow whereof would cause men to thinke amisse of Scipio. Howsoever it was, thus * Appian tels it: and many circumstances of things done, confirme it. Afdris- * Appian. Alexan. bal, the some of Gefco, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syphax and Masanissa lo de Bell Punic. ved. Masanisa, being brought up at Caribage, and being withall a goodly Gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Asarabal to beehis sonne-in-law. When Liv.ib.29.

When the virgin was betrothed unto him, he went into Spaine, and there did great service. But afterwards, the Caribaginian Senate thought the marriage of Afdrubals daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her upon Syphax, without standing to acquaint her father or Masanissa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mighty Prince; and for that the indignity of the repulse, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Masanissa was advertised; and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as he thought, yet not so secretly, but some notice was taken of it: which would have cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conveigned himselfe home into his fathers Kingdome. Thus far forth we may beleeve Appianus: all the narration wellcohering with things past, and following. Onely it seemes, that how soever Sopho- 10 nisba, the daughter of Afdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians unto Syphax: yet fince this their courtesie proceeded from fear, he thought it wildome to continue and increase the same their seare, by making faire promises to the Romans, untill Astrubalhad Sent for his daughter from Carihage, and the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the war it felfe, wherein Appian differs much from Livie, and from Polybina, whom (as appears by the broken pieces of his works remaining) Livie did follow; it will be no offence to take little heed unto his reports.

The fifth Booke of the first part

Masanisa was the sonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crown descended, by order of the Country, unto Defalces the brother, not unto Mafanessa the sonne. But this Uncle of Masanssa shortly dyed : and his elder sonne, who took 20 possession of the kingdome, was vanquished, and slaine in battell by a Rebel, that mode himselse Protector over the younger which was a child. The Traitor fortified himselse against Masanisa, whose returns he feared, by Alliances with the Carthaginians and syphax. But all would not serve: He and his Pupill, were dispossessed of their Estates by Masanisa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloved for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason would have been glad, that Masanisa, who had done them notable service, was thus confirmed in his Estate; had they not been guiltie of the injurie by them done unto him; whilest his Uncle or Cousin reigned, and he seemed unlikely to stand them in any stead. But syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his own malice, towards his Corrival, warred upon him; and over-charging him with num-39 bers, drave him out of his Kingdome. Nevertheleffe Mafanifa still retained the hearts of his people; and thereby remained strong enough, to infest both syphax and the Caribaginians; though he was often put in distresse, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the leffer Syrris, between the borders of the Caribaginians and the Nation of the Garamans, expected the comming of the Romans: yet fo, as he made long roades over all the Country, even as far as to Hippo; and when Lalim arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to hasten on Scipio to the invasion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whose great aide and succour was reposed more hope of good successe, than could be expected from the good will of poore Mafaniffa, fent an Embaffage into 40 Sicil about the same time, which was little pleasing unto Scipio. He excused himselfe of his promife lately made : and fignified his alliance with the Carthaginians ; adding, That he could not choose but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein he was borne and reigned; and for the defence of his beloved wives Country, if it were invaded. Nevertheleffe he promised to remain a Neuter, so long as the Romans and Carthaginians held war abroad, far enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This message hastened Scipio in his expedicion, much more than any perswasion could have done. For the promifed affiftance of Syphax had not a little advanced his enterprife; in procuring both the affent of the Senate, and the forwardnesse of many Adventurers. Lest therefore the failing of this hope, should worke too great a change in common opinion, Hee thought it 50 the best way, to prevent all discourse, and set the warre undertaken immediately on foot. The Embassadours he dismissed in haste, with letters to their King: wherein hee willed him to confider, that what hee had promised, hee had also sworne; and therefore should doe well to make it good. Having sent them away, Hee called his Souldiers together; and bade them make ready for the voyage, which hee intended no longer to deferre. For, said be, Masanisa hath been with Lelius: and Syphax hath newly sent to mee; greatly wondering upon what I should thus stay; and saying, That they will provide for themselves, if I faile their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale prevented all further inquisition, that might else have been made concerning the message of these Embassadors: whose followers had been seene walking up and downe syracuse. And less any thing should afterwards breake out that might hinder the businesse, Scipio immediately sent about his sleet unto Lilybaum: and requesting by letters MiPomponius, that was Prætor in Sicil, to meet him there; hasted thither with his Army. At Lilybaum he agreed with the Prætor, about the division of the Legions between them; which to leave behinde for desence of the Iland; and which to carry with him information of the straight of the services of the straight of

This Roman Army landed in Africk, neere to a fore-land then called the faire Promontorie: which how farre it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compaffe, I cannot precisely affirme; because it is uncertaine, whether it were that Cape or Headland which bore the name of Mercurie, and lay to the North-east of Carihage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The comming of Masanissa unto Scipio at his first arrivall, helpes to confirme the opinion of Xylander: who thinks the faire Promontorie to have been the fame, that was also called Mercuries Cape, fince with little difficulty Masanisia might come thither from the lefter Syris, whereabout was his common abiding. But forafmuch as without any memorable impediment foon after his arrivall Scipio encamped before Wica, that flood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather seeme, that hee landed within the Promontorie of Apollo; whence the way to utica was not long. This is also strongly proyed; for that out of Carthage were fent, the next day, five hundred horse to trouble him in his dif-embarking. Neither was it fo hard for Mafaniffa, that roved about the Countrie with a troupe of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which he usually reforted, like as before hee had met with Laliusat Hippe that was farther off; as it would have been for Scipio, with his Armie and Carriages, to overcome the trouble of a long journey, and fetch a great compasse to utica, by Land; when he might have dif-embarqued neerer unto it. Nevertheleffe it may passe as a conjecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentifull Region about the leffer Syris; fince he gave charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lilybann, to shape their course for that coast. The Countrey thereabout was very rich, and fit for fustenance of an Army: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well provided to make refistance. Thus much perhaps Masanisa had signified unto Lalius, when he spake with o him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howfoever they made brave promifes, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when he saw their Fleet and Army to bee fuch, as not onely ferved to invade the lands of Carthage, but threatned a conquest of the City and whole Estate: then might be better advise them to set saile for utica, and make War upon the Enemies at their owne doores.

The Carthaginians had atthattime neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Army than of raw Souldiers; that were levied, or to be levied in hafte. Afarnbal the fon of Gefeo, the same that had lately been chased out of Spaine by Scipio, was their bestman of war. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanne and his fellowes, of whose faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobility, otogether with the affinity of King Syphax, made him paffeable. He was then with the King his fon-in-law, working him no doubt against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Invafion: entreating the one of them to give affiftance, and commanding the other to make his re-Paire unto the Citie, where he was chosen Generall. But ere these could be ready, Scipio hadbeaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were fent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and flaine Hanno a young Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and facked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, befides other booty, hee tookeeight thousand prisoners; all which he conveighed aboord his Hulks or Ships of burden Hhhhh burden, and fent them backe loaden into Sicil. He tooke likewise a Towne called Salera, which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with fourethousand Numidian horse: whose service being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places, made Scapio to perceive the unskilfulnesse of their Leader, that had thus housed them. Wherefore he fent Masanissa before him: who rode up to the gates; and, by making a bravado, trained out the improvident Hanno fo farre, that he drew him unto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victorie was eafily gotten, and Hanno either taken, or flaine. With those that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the towne, which presently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Mica, a City of great importance, of which mention harh beene formerly made, and fate downe before it. Forty dayes he spent about it, affailing it both by Land and Sea, and using all his engines of battery, whereof he had plenty, yet was in no likelihood of prevailing. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter-Campe, which must be well stored against the yeere following. Whilest thus necessity urged him to leave trica; and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than any hope of better successe, caused him to stay there: Astrabal and Syphax gave him the honour of a faire pretence to leave the fiege. Aftrubal had made a Levie of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse: yet adventured not with this ill-trained Army to draw neere unto the Romans, before the comming of Syphan. Syphan brought with him unto Carthage fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse: which 20 joyning unto the forces of Afarubal, they marched bravely toward Scipio; who thereby tooke occasion to dislodge. He chose for his Winter-Campe the banks of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Navie. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontorie, joyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horse-men he bestowed upon lower ground, on the other shoare: in the bottome of the Creek he mored his ships; and there he quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged unto the Fleet. The whole campe he strongly fortified, and so attended the season of the yeere, when it should serve him agains to fight. Of cattell and other bootie Masanissa had brought in great store, by driving the Countrey, before the comming of Afdrubal and Syphax. Corne also he had gotten fome: and great store was sent him from Sicil and Sardinia. Likewise apparell for his 30 Souldiers, was fent from home, or from Sardinia: though fearce enough to ferve turne, for that it was a matter of more cost. The ships that brought these things, he fraighted homewards with fuch part of his bootie, as he could best spare; especially with captives to be fold for flaves. Afdrubal and Syphan encamped neere unto Scipio: not fo flrongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romans, either for that they wanted the severe institution, which the Komans used in the discipline of warre, or for that they presumed upon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to issue foorth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action.

When Spring drew neere, Scipio thought it good to affay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps he might be wonne by perswasions to forsake the Carihagmians. 40 It was confidered, that those Barbarians were naturally unconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had given proofe before this of his much levitie. It might therefore bee hoped, That having wearied himselse, by lodging a whole Winter in the Campe : and being peradventure no lesse weary with fatiety of his wife, who had caused him to enter into this warre : he might be moved with a little entreatie to withdraw himfelfe home into his Kingdome, and reft a Neuter. But it is not unlikely, that fuch a friend as this King, had beene highly entertained and honoured in the City of Carthage, which was neere at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had beene invited, to make a step thither and repose himselfe a while : his wife Queene sophonishalying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. Howsoever it were, 59-50 phax did onely make an overture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Hannibal should by recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like fort should quietly depart out of Africke, and so make an end of the warre: wherewith now both Africke and Europe were disquieted. Unto this would not Scipio at the first give eare: yet being pressed earnestly by many messages from Syphax, and desiring to continue the inter-course of Embassadors, he began to make shew, as if he would consider of the motion. He was given to understand by those whom he had sent unto the King, That the Enemies had their campes without any great defence of earth, full of woodden Cab-bins, and covered with boughs: and that the Numidians, fuch of them as came first with Syphax, used coverings of Mattes and Reeds; others, that came later, had thatched their lodgings with drie boughes and leaves : under which they lay carelefly without their Trenches. Upon this advertisement he bethought himselfe, That it would not be hard for him to fet their campes on fire, and thereby give them a notable overthrow. Without helpe of some such firatageme, hee fore- faw that it would be a worke of great difficulty for him, to proceed in his warres when time should serve. It was a plaine open Countrey wherein he lay : and the Enemies had great advantage of him in number, especially in horse; which, upon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought upon the matter; the more needfull he found it for himselfe, to make some sudden attempt upon their Campe. To this end hee sent many Embaffadours, under pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeed of purpose to discover all that might concerne the intended surprise. With these Embassadours he sent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers, disguised like slaves; that wandering (as it were) idle up and downe the Campe, might observe the wayes and entrances, with whatfoever else was needfull. When he had learned as much as he defired: upon the fudden he fent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie, for a funch as he could not get the consent of his Councell of warre; without whose approbation, all that himselfe could doe, was no more, than the good will of one man. This hedid, to the end that, without any breach of faith, he might put his defigne in execution. The Truce being thus cut off, Afdrubal and Syphax were very penfive; as having lately perswaded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better they began to devise, by what art they might draw Scapio out of his Campe, and provoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe, they hoped to make his Councell of war repent as greatly the refufall of peace, as did Marcus Atilius after the like prefumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches, what else remained than to besiege him ? which they themselves were well able to do by land; and the Carthaginian fleet should doe by Sea, that was making ready for the purpose. By fuch discourses these two comforted themselves; recompencing (in conceipt) the losse of their hopes past, with that of victorie to come. But herein they were extreamly and worthily disappointed: for that consulting about the future, they provided not against present danger, but continued in the same negligence, which was growne upon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle; but made preparation out of hand, as it were to doe somewhat against wice. Two thousand Souldiers he had made ready, and appointed to take the same peece of ground, whereon he lay against unca before. This he did, partly to keep secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to have notice of its partly to hinder those of utica from setting upon the few, that he purposed to leave behinde him in his Campe. He caused his men that night to sup well, and betimes; that they to might bee ready for the journey. After supper, he appointed such Companies as he thought fit, to the defence of his Campe; all the rest of the army he led forth, about nine of the clocke at night. The Carihaginians lay from him seaven miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to undertake himselfe with the one halfe of his army; the other halfe he committed to Lalius and Masanissa, whom he sent before him to set upon the campe of Syphax, that was father off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carihag mians. For the fire might feemeno have taken hold by casualty upon the Numidians, that lay faither off whereas if it first appeared in the campe of Afdrubal; it would be suspected as the doing of enemies; and give Syphax warning to looke to himself. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire and 50 fofily; that Lalius & Mafaniffa, who had a longer journey; and were to fetch a compaffe about for feare of being discovered, might have time to get before him, and do their fear. It was about two or three of the clocke in the morning, when the campe of syphase began to blaze: which not onely the Numidians, but their King himselfe, imputed unto calualty ; as thinking themselves fafe enough from enemies, for that the Carthag mians lay interposed betweene them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, fome, flarting halfcaffeepe; and others, that had fitten up late at drinking, ranne out of their Cabbins to grench the fire. But fo great was the tumult, that they neither could rightly understand in what case they were, nor give any remedie to the mischance, as it Hhhhhh 2

was supposed. Many were smothered and burnt in the slame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the sudden mischiefe, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, fell upon the enemies fword, which was ready to receive them. Especially Masanissa, that best knew the Countrie, did great execution upon them; having laid all the waies, by which hee foresaw that they would seeke to escape. The Caribaginians perceiving this fire. thought none other than that it was a pittifull mischance : so that some ranne out to helpe the poore Numidians; carrying onely what would ferve to quench the fire. Others ranne up to the Rampart: where , fearelesse of any danger towards themselves. they flood beholding the greatnesse of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scigio would have it. He therefore loft no time: but fetting upon those that were running towards the Numidians, he killed forme, and pursued the rest back into their campe, which in a little while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Asdrubalsceing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not stand to make refiftance, but shifted onely for himselfe, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had been taken in fuch a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanno would have judged him worthy to be crucified. It would then have beene faid, that with leffe than one halfe of thirty thousand men, hee might at least have given some bad recompence, to them that were taking pains in kindling these fires, had he not beene only carefull how to fave his owne fear efull head. Nevertheleffe 20 Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to have beene true, That if Astrubal, or any of those about him, would have striven to shew valour, when the Campe was once on fire: He should not thereby have done any manner of good, because of the tumult and consternation. I shall not need to tell what a fearefull thing it was, to heare the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruell flame that confumed them; which (as Polybius affirmes) none that bath beeing is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands very few did escape; which accompanied Afdrubal and Syphax in their feverall wayes of flight. Befides thefe also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saved themselves in the darke: but they were not many , as after shall appeare. Surely it must needes have beene yery hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made away, and what numbers escaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Livie, who in the rest of this Relation, as often elsewhere, doth follow Polybius, may seem to have followed some lesse worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in casting up the summe. For hee reckons onely two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, to have escaped; forty thousand to have perished by sword or fire; and above fixe thousand to have bin taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre short of fourescore and thirteene thousand, which were in these two Campes...

Afarubal, putting himself into the next town that was very strongly fortified, thought there to finde the Romans worke, untill the Carthaginians at good leisure might repaire their Army. He had with him no more than two thousand foot, and five hundred horse: which hee thought sufficient to defend the Towne; if the Townes-men would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeeld. Unto this disputation, he well foresaw that the arrivall of Scipio would soone give anend. Wherefore, less they should lay hold upon him, and seeke the Victors savour by delivering him up; he shrunke away betimes; and made all haste to Carthage. As for the towne: which he lest; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his sirst comming: and thereby preserved it selfe from all manner of losse. The two next Towness adjoying would needs be valiant; and make countenance of war: but their strength not being answerable, they were soone taken by Scipio; who so abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This being done; he returned to the steep of strice of strices.

The Carthaginians were fore troubled, as they had good reason, when, in stead of either Peace or Victory, which they lately hoped for they heard newes of such a lamentable overthrow. Necessity enforced them to make hastic provision for the surre: but how to doe it, sew of them saw any meanes. Some gave advice to crave peace of Scipio others, to send for Hannihal out of Italy; but the most, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion. That notwithstanding the loss of this Army, they might went defend themselves against the Romans, by raising new forces: especially, if Syrbax would not leave them. It was therefore concluded, That they should bend all their care this way, lewying in all hafte another Army; and fending Embaffadours to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Abba, not paffing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their unfortunate Commander, Asarabal the some of Gesco, was employed to make new levies of men and Queene Sophonicha went forth with Embaffadours to her busband Syphax; who having garhered together as many as hee could of his subjects that had escaped from the lare flaughter, was thinking to returne into his owne Kingdorne. Sophonisha laboured fo with her husband, that at length the wonne him to her owne defire. And it fell out at the fame time, that foure thousand Spaniards, waged by the Caribaginians, were brought over to serve in Africke. Of these were made fuch brave reports, as if their courage, and the armes which they used, were not to bee refifted. Even the multitude within Carthage beleeved these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, fince in one Age, the whole country of spaine had been twice conquered, first, by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphan shefe tales prevailed much: which the Carthaginian Embaffadors helped with a lye , faying , That there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Upon this confidence, the people of Currhage and their friends gathered fuch fpirit, that in thirty dates they made up an Army confifting wel-neere of thirty thousand men, reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphan with his Numidians in the number. So they incamped in a Region called , The Great Fields, about five dayes journey from utica. Scipio hearing of this, came from utica thither, to visit them; leaving behinde him his impediments, with some part of his Army, to make a shew of continuing the fiege. Two or three daies, after the meeting of both armies, passed away in skirmish. without any great thing done. It had now been time for, Afdrubal to follow the example of the Roman Fabrus, and feeke to weary out the Enemy by delayes. But either (which is likely) he was a farre worse Commander, or else, it was not in his power to give fuch directions as best pleased himselfe. The fourth day the Armies met in bartaile: wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after their wonted manner, having their Italian horse in the right wing; and Masanisa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary fide, Afdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left: and the Spaniards, the battaile. The victory was gotten without many blowes: for the untrained followers of Syphax and Afdrubal, could not sustaine the first charge of the Italians, or of Mafanilla. Only the Spaniards fought a long time, even untill they were all in a manner flaine: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercy, fince they were thus come over to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserved of them. than upon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obstinacie was beneficiall to those that fled, for that it hindred the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Afdrubal, and Syphax escaped: Asdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home to his owne Kingdome: whether his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scippo, having thus gotten the maftery of the field tooke counfaile about the profecution of the warre. It was resolved upon as the best course, That he himselfe, with part of the Army, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Masanisia, with his Numidians, and Lalius, with some of the Roman Legions, should followe after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his owne Kingdome, where easily else he might repaire his forces, and put them to new trouble. This advice, it seemes that Masanissa gave: who knew best the quality of the Numidians; and what good might bee done among them, by the reputation of a victory. The least that could be expected, was his reflitution into his own Kingdom, usurped by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no lesse concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himselfe. According to this order concluded . Lalius was fent away with Masanissa: and Scipio stayed behinde, carrying the warre from towne to towne. Many places yeelded for feare; many were taken by force; and all the subjects of Carthage wavered in their fidelity, as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those unreasonable burdens, which their proud Mafers had laid upon them for maintenance of the warre in Spaine and Italy. What to doe in this case the Carthaginians could hardly resolve. Fortune was their Enemy; they had loft their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durst they make bold to trouble their owne fubjects with any violent exaction of men or money; who nevertheleffe of Hhhhhh 3

Fleet, and some, appointed thereunto, forthwith to embarque themselves for Italy. In this their trepidation Scipio come to Tunes, a City in those dayes very strong, 20 and standing in prospect almost of every part of Carsbage. This place, or rather some defencible piece adjoyning, he eafily tooke; the garrison for faking it, and running away as soone as he drew neere. But whilest he was about there to incampe, and fortifichimselse against the City, he might perceive the Carthaginian Fleet setting forth, and making towards wica: What this meant, he readily conceived; and stood in great feare, lest his own ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heavily loden with engines of battery, & wholly disposed in such order; as was most convenient for assaulting the towne) should make bad refistance, against a fleet appointed for that special service. Wherefore he hasted away towards usica, to affish with his presence in this needfull case. It fell out well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great booty which he 30 drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he should have come too late. Neither could he indeed have been there in due time, if the Carthaginians had used such diligence as was convenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way and at their comming to Misca, they tarried awhile to make a bravado; presenting themselves in order of battell, as if the Romans would have put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent : hee thought it would be sufficient, if he could preserve his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their braverie at Sea; it should little availe the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole estate by Land. Wherefore he tooke his ships of burden, and fastning them together with cables, in foure ranks, one behinde another, made a foure-fold bridge over the Channel of the Haven; whereon he placed a thousand of his choice men, with store of Darts, and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces he left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessels, might run out and backe againe upon any advantage or need: but these he covered with planckes, using the masts and yards of his ships in stead of rafters, to joyne all together, that his men might helpe one another, and the bridge it selfe not be torne asunder. Scarce was this worke finished, when the Caribaginians, feeing none iffue forth against them, came into the Haven. The fight betweene them and the Romans that were in the Hulks, was rather like to the affaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood upon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards, with their whole strength and violence; which the Cartha-50 ginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and uniteady, could not do. But the Roman Frigots & long boats, adventuring forth from behind the bridge, were greatly over-born by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. They that flood upon the Bridge were neither able to relieve them, nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for feare of hurting these their friends, that were intangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grappling hooks, hanging at Iron chaines. These they threw upon the masts and yards which served as arches to joyne the bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all afunder; in fuch fort, that one ship followed another, & all the firstranke was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to save themselves as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next ranke of ships, that lay behinde them untouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious worke: but having haled away sixe ships of burden, and towed them out of the Haven, returned home to Carthage. Their wel-come was greater than their victory: because among so many grievous losses, onely this exploit had succeeded well, though it were of small importance.

though it were of small importance. Whilest things thus passed about Caribage, Lalius and Masanisa, in their journed to against Syphax, found as good successe as could be defired. The same of the victories already gotten, restored Masanisa to his Kingdome, without farther contention: the Ma-Cafili, his fubjects, joyfully receiving him, & forfaking the ulurpers. But here they staved not : neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. Hee had such abundance of menand horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and therefore being solicited by Aldrubal and Sophonisha, hee prepared agains for warre. But beside the instigation of his beloved wife ; the loffe of the Mafefili would let him take no reft : neither was it the purpose of Laliza and Masanisa, to give him any breathing time. It is common in men. to depart no leffe unwillingly from that which they have gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance; but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in possession, bee the title unto some part never so unjust. Hercunto alludes the fable of the young Kite; which thought that she had vomitted up her owne gurs, when it was onely the garbage of some other fowle, that she had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digeft. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, beleeved the Kingdome of the Mafafili to be part of his entrailes: Lalim and Mafaniffa will shortly give him somewhat that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come fo farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossesse (if it might be) that King, whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had beene converted into strong enmity; as alfo to fet in his place another, who might do them fuch good offices, as Syphax had lately done unto the Caribaginians. How eafily this might be effected, Masanisa knew best. 30 as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries, wherein even to this day though there be many strong Towns, yet the fortune of a battaile is enough, to translate the Kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came against them with no lesse an Armie, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman or der, according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion; long agoe fent unto him out of Spaine from Cn. Scipio. But though he could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight couragiously. They were a rabble of all forts, gathered up in hafte : and few of them had feene warre before. Encamping necre unto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that fome small troupes of horse on both fides, encountred one another in the mid-way : and they that had the worst, were 40 feconded by other of their fellowes. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawne out from either Campe: fo that at length Syphax, unwilling to dichearten his men by taking any foile at their first meeting with the Enemy, came up with all his horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith over-charged Masanilla, whose numbers were farre leffe. But whilest he was profecuting his hope of victory: some Roman squadrons of Foot came against him through their own Troupes of horse; which fell to the fides, and made a lane for them. So their bartaile standing now more firme, than a little before; Syphax was unable, though he laboured much in vaine, to make them give ground. Mafanissa likewise, and his Troupes grew confident upon this affiftance and charging afresh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, caused him to give backe. Herewithall the Legions came in fight : which terrefied fo the Numidian horse, that they beganne presently to dis-band. Faine would siphax have stayed them from flight : and to that end made head in person against the Romans; with hope. that his men would be ashamed to leave him. But it fell out unhappily, that hee was cast from his horse, which received a wound, and so taken prisoner. Of others that were flaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It fufficed, that they for fooke the place. and fled, and that their King, upon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Mafanifatold Lalius, that this victory should made an end of the Numidian war, if presently they halted away to Cirta the chiefe Ciry of the Kingdome; whither he himselfe desired tobe fent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Lulium agreed. Masaniff a comming to Cirta, before any news of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chiefe of the City to parlee: wherein by many faire promifes and threats, but especially by shewing unto them Syphax bound, he prevailed so farre, that the gates were forthwith opened unto him; and every one strove to get his favour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queen Sophonisha yeelded her selfe into his hands, and vehemently befought him, that the might not be delivered up unto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beauty, so commended her fuite, that Masanilla forthwith granted it; & to make good his promise, married her himselfe that very day: thereby to prevent Lalius and Scipio from determining otherwise of ber, since she was 10 his wife. But Lelius, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainoufly, fo that at first he would have haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and have fent her unto Scipio. But being over-intreated by Mafanifa, he suffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he sent away syphax and other captives immediately; following shortly after himselfe with Masanifa, when they had done what was needfull in the Kingdome.

At the comming of Syphax, there was great joy in the Roman Campe : the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the field; and his entertainment of Scipio and Aftarubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together fought his friendship; with fisch other commemoration of his past and present forume; ministring to every 20 one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moved him, not onely to forfake the Roman friendship, but to make warre upon them, unprovoked. He briefly answered, That his wife had moved him so to doe; calling her a Fury, and a nefilent creature and faying, that Mafanifa was no wifer than hunfelfe, fince hee had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courfes, Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled; and stood in great doubt, lest this perillous woman should deprive him of Majanissa, as the had done of Syphan. It was not long, ere Majaniff a and Lalius came unto him : both of whom together he lovingly welcommed; and highly commended in publique, for their notable fervice in this Expedition. Then taking Masanissa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisha: letting him understand, that the Romans had title to her head, and that she was a mischievous enemy of theirs. Wherefore he increated him to moderate his affoctions: and not to deface the memory of his great services already done (for which hee should bee highly rewarded to his owne contentment) by committing a great offence upon little reason. Masanila blusher, and wept; and finally promised to be governed by Scipio, whom he nevertheleffe intreated, to thinke upon his faith given to Sophonisha, that the should not bee delivered into the Romans power. So he departed to his owne Tent, where, after some time Spent in agony, he called unto him a servant of his that had the custody of his poylon (which Princes used then to have in a readinesse, against all mischances that might make them unwilling to live:) and tempering a potion for Saphonisha, fent it unto her with this message; That gladly he would have had her to live with him as his wife: but fince they who had power to hinder him of his defire, would not yeeld thereto, he fent her a cup, that should preserve her from falling alive into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for her selfe.

At the receit of this Message and Present, shee onely said; That if her husband had no better token to fend unto his new wife, she must accept of this; adding, That she might have dyed more honourably, if the had not wedded to lately before her funerall. And herewithall the boldly dranke off the poison. Thus Livie reporteth. But Appian varies from this; and fets it downe agreably to that which hath beene spoken before, concerning the precontract betweene Mafanissa and Sophonisha. He faith, That after 50 the taking of Syphax, Embassadours from Cirta met with Lalius and Masanisa upon their way thither, yeelding up their City, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophoniba, for her owne private, sent messengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax, as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power she was. Masanisa readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had received information from Syphax, how cunning in perswafion Sophonisha was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; he fell out about her with Masanisa at his returne, and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans. Masanisa said, she, was his owne wife, and unto him betrothed many yeeres before. But Scipio would not heare of this or if it were true, yet he faid it was no reason, that Masanilla should keepe her in possession, as long as it was disputable, unto whom she might appertaine. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claime unto her, wherein he should have no wrong. Herewithall he sent to fetch her away: and Malanilla accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliver her: but making her acquainted with the necessity, gave unto her a cup of poison, where with she ended her life, before they came that should have apprehended her. So he shewed unto the Romans her dead body, which he royally interred. The fudden violence of Masanissa his love. and the ready confent of Sophonisha to marry with him: adde not fo much credit unto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other evident cause (which Livie notes) Lib. 28. of the fudden falling out betweene him and the Carthaginians, under whom he had bin trained up, and done them great service. How soever it were; Scipio, hearing of this tragicall accident, fent for Masanissa, and comforted him as well as he could, lest his melancholy should leade him to some inconvenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rafhnesse, he brought him forth in presence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had deserved of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King, and gave unto him a Crowne of gold, with other Royall ornaments. This was indeed the ready way to divert his thoughts from the fad remembrance of that which was past, unto the more cheerefull contemplation of good fortune, that began to fmile upon him.

This was the first time that the Romans took upon them to create or proclaim a King. Which honour though Masanissa well deserved: yet would not the Title have redounded unto his great benefit; neither should he have beene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their meanes recovered possession of his Country, together with the greatest part of Syphax his Dominions. It seemeth not unlikely, that had he remained a Neuter in these warres, and sustained himselfe with his troupe of horse, in such fort as he did before the comming of the Romans; he might reverthelesse have recovered his proper inheritance by the love of his owne fubjects without other helpe, when Syphane had once or twice beene vanquished. As for the inlargement of his Kingdome, it was not more than he deserved: neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they have wished a fitter opportunity, than of fuch a man, upon whom to beffow it, that was their affured friend, and paffable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Masasyli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noised abroad as very glorious; and the Romans themselves, in a politicke fort of gravity, tooke highly upon them; as if even their faluting him by the name of King, had beene a matter of great confeduence. He thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, incroaching upon his neighbours on all fides; but most of all upon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Vermina the fon of Syphax (of whom we shall shortly speake more) which held some piece of his fathers Kingdome, defiring friendship of the Romans, and promiting by all meanes to deferve their love requested therewithall that they would call him King. But though it were so, that never any before him had made this a matter of fuit : yet the Roman Senate was puntilious herein, and answered very gravely, That it was not their custome to give Livillette the honour of that appellation, fave onely unto fuch Kings, as had greatly deferved of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State; and in processe of time grew so proud of this their imaginary prerogative, that they imputed as a fingular benefit unto Kings, that noway depended upon them, the falutation by * that name, though it were not accom- cogas commo panied with any ofter favour or profit thence redounding.

He Carthaginians were extremely difmayed, when they heard of the great cal lamity, that was befallie their good friend syphax, and understood that Malanissa their mortall enemy, had got possession of his Kingdome. To increase their feare, Scipio returned agains to Tunes in view of their City: where he made an end of that Fortification, which he had begun at his last being there. The Caribagia nians had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they fent forthuntothem thirty Embaffadors, Princes of the city, which were their Privie Councell, to make suite for peace. These being admitted into the presence of scipio, did not onely profrate themselves on the ground; but kissed the * feet of him, and Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselves to have unjustly broken the Peace between them and Rome; and to have deferved whatfoever punishment it should please the Romans to inslict upon them. Yet they humbly befought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes. whereto all men are subject, they would shew mercy unto the City of Carthage, and let 10 it remaine, as a monument of their clemency; which, by the folly of her Citizens, had now twice deserved to be overthrown, Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame upon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begunne the Warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole Citie. By this it appeares, that these Embassadours were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno, and the choice of his company; who had now their long defired worke in hand, of suing unto the Romans for peace. Whatsoever they were, it must needs be that they were most insolent men over those that were subject unto their power, for they would not have made fuch adoration to the Romans in their owne necessity unlesse they themfelves had expected the like, where they had the advantage.

It was not unknowne to Scipio, or to his affiftants, in what poore cafe the city of Rome 20 then was; and how unable to defray the charges of continuing the warre. Neither were the Carihaginians, notwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately beene. For they had money enough, wherewithto wage more men: they had a Citie farre stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrusted the walls of Carthage; though Utica, a weaker Citie, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Army, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and told them, That though hee came into Africke, to make a conquest, and not a Peace: yet having the Conquest as it were in his hand, he 30 would not deny to grant them the Peace which they defired; for thereby should all Nations understand, that the people of Kome did follow the rule of Justice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed upon them, were these; That they should render up unto him all the prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegadoes and fugitive flaves: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italy and Gaule: That they should not meddle in Spaine, nor yet in any Hand betweene Italy and Africk: That they should deliver up all their shippes of warre, save twenty; and that they should pay a great summe of money, with certaine hundred thousand bushels of wheat and barley. To confider of these Articles, he gave them three dayes: and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might fend Embaffadours unto 40 the Roman Senate.

This done, Masanissa was dismissed, and went home into his Kingdome, as if the war had beene already at an end. Syphax was a little before fent with Lælius unto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with joy, and gave hope, that the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were set open; and an holy day appointed for thankefgiving and supplication to their gods. Lelius was accompanied with Embaffadors from King Masanisa: who gratulating the happy fuccesse of the Romans in their African warre, and giving thankes unto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio unto their Master, made request for the Numidians, such as were now his subjects and prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed upon him, who by 50 rendring them to liberty, should doe an activery plausible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not behinde with Masaniffa in complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should do for him, they called him King againe; released his Numidians that were captives; and fent him two purple Caffocks, that had each of them one gold button, with fuch other presents, as in time of their poverty might serve to te-Stiffe their good will. Scarcely were these and Lalius gone from Rome, when the newes came, that Embassadors from Carthage were arrived to desire peace. These Embassadors were not admitted into the Citie, but were lodged without: untill Lælius being sent for, came backe from Oftia, to be prefent when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience given them in the Temple of Bellona; that stood in the Suburbs. The errand of these Embassadours, was peace, but the meaning of them and of their City, was onely to winne time, and get respite for warre; untill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italy, either to chase the Romans out of Africk, or to obtaine peace for Carthage, by terrour of their great names and Armies, upon more easie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded betweene them and Lustains Carulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they faid, all things well confidered, did ftill remaine in force: neither had there fince beene any warre at all, betweene the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was only Hannibal, that, without any leave from Carthage, had of his owne head befieged and razed the Towne of Saguntum: and after that adventured in like fort, without Commission, to passe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being fo, their Meffage was none other, than to defire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale, hearing these Embassadours make (as it were) a jeast of a warre, that had beene so terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that peace made by Ludatius, and other paffages following betweene the two on Cities. But they excused themselves, by their age: (for they were all young men) and faid, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they fought no other than to gaine time, untill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were fent home in company of Lalim, without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without answer. This notwithstanding, we finde in Polybius, That the Senate receiving advertisement from Except, 2Polyb. Scipio, of that which had paffed betweene him and the Carthaginians in this Treatie of ub. 15. peace, approved the Conditions by him propounded, and gave him licence thereupon, to proceed unto conclusion. This may with good reason bee believed, since it was not unknowne, that if the warre continued, all these goodly hopes must rest upon the most uncertaine issue of one battell between Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should be averse to them, their forces in Africke were no better than quite lost.

Matters thus hanging in fuspence, before the Carthaginian Embaffadours came backe from Rome, a Fleet out of Sicil, wherein were two hundred shippes of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africke, to victuall the Roman Campe, was over-taken by foule-weather at Sea, and hardly escaping wreck, was dispersed, and driven aground indivers parts of the Bay of Carthage, even in view, and under command of the Citie. There was at that time, as we finde in Appear, and may gather out of Polybeau, a great dearth of victualls in Carthage, which caused the people to cry out upon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a booty escape them, saying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger urged them, or that they yeelded to their owne greedy defires: the multitude in Carthage understood (as it seems) that all this discourse of Peace in hand, was no better than meere mockery, and therefore cared not for observation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for Except. 2 Post. all the rascality, together with women and boyes, to be medling in uproares; the clamors 46.15. of the boyes being in such tumults no lesse violent than of the men. Wherefore it is no marvaile, if little regardwere had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was fent out under Asdrubal, to gather up the dispersed Roman shippes of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recovered the station whereto their camp adjoyned) and bring them into Carihage; which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended : not onely for the loffe, and for that the Towne was thereby relieved; but for that by this breach of Truce, he fore-faw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the warre, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadours unto them, both to require fatisfaction for the injury done; and to deterre them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much defired. These gave the Carthaginians to understand, That Letters were come from Rome unto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace; upon those conditions which he had propounded. But (faid they) we hold it strange, That ye, who fo lately have cast your selves to the ground before us & kissed our feete,

after an un-usuall manner of humility, confessing your selves to have persidiously broken the League that was betweene us, and thereby to have deferved such punishment as is due unto Rebels; should so soone forget what ye then uttered, and runne headlong againe into the same crimes, for which ye acknowledged your selves worthy to be destroyed, having only recourse unto our mercy. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in Hannibal, that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amisse, that yee should consider, how long he hath bin pent up in a corner of Italy, among the Brutians; where he is in a manner befieged, and unable to stirre: so that yee are like to find his helpe wanting in your greatest need. Or let it be Supposed, that he were now in Africke, and ready to give in battaile: yet should it well agree with your wisedome, to doubt what might befall; remembring that he is a man, and not invincible. Now if it hould happen that he were overcome, what refuge have ye left unto your selves against hereafter? What gods will yee either sweare by , to be beleeved , or call upon in your misery? What words, and lamentable gesture will ye henceforth use, to move compassion? Surely yee have already wasted all your force of perswasion, and shall not againe deceive us, if ye refuse the grace, whereof at this present yee are capable. It is no marvell though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themselves upbraided with the base demeanour of their Embassadors. For it was not the generall opinion of the city, that the Truce was broken by themselves: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all justification of matters past. And indeed it seemes, that the Roman Embassadours were very much delighted, in the rehearfall of that point which was yeelded unto them, as knowing that thereon depended the justice of the quarrell. But the Caribaginians tooke this in so ill part, that hardly they could refraine from doing violence unto the men, who had used unto them such insolent speeches. Yet the fury of the multitude was in some fort appealed; either by Hanno, whom Appian, (I know not why) calles Hanno the Great: or by the very reverence, due unto the place of those that had uttered such liberall words. So they were dismissed in friendly fort, although it were without answer to their Proposition. There were also two gallies appointed for their fafe convoy home; though with little intent of good unto their persons. Asdrubal was then in the mid-way, as men failed from Carthage towards unca. 30 He, whether onely desirous to please the multitude, of whose disposition he was informed, or whether directed by publike order to cut off these Embassadours in their way homeward, lay waiting for them behinde a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the river Bagradas. Their Convoy having brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradus, wished them a good voyage; and so tooke leave of them, as if they had beene then in safety, since the Roman Camp was even in sight. The Embassadours tooke this in ill part; not as fearing any danger toward, but thinking themselves 100 much neglected, for affinuch as their attendants did so abruptly leave them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Afdrubal fell upon them, in such manner, as they might well discerne his purpose; which was to have stemmed them. They rowed hard 40 therefore : and being in a Quinquereme, that had more bankes of Oares, than had any Gallie of Afdrubal, they slipt away, and made him over-shoot himselfe. Yet hee gave them chase, and had well-neere surprised them. But they discovered some Roman Companies on the shoare over against them, and therefore adventured to runne their Vessell aground: whereby they faved their owne lives, though a great part of their company were flaine, or hurt. This practice of the Carthaginians was inexcufable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartned in such a dishonorable attempt, by those that were defirous to continue the warre; that thereby they might be driven to studie nothing else, than how to get the victory, as having none other hope remayning. Yet likely it is, that the same feare, which had caused them to make such earnest suite for 50 peace, would also have caused them to be better advised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatie; had they not beene given to understand, that Hannibal was already landed in Africk, in whom they repoled no small confidence; but verily persivaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themselves conrented with more easie conditions, than were those that Scipes, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded. nga mininggan pangkanasa ang kalang pan

J. XX.
In what fort Hannibal frent the time after the battell of Metaurus. The doings of Mago in Italy. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italy. How the Romans were diverly affected by Hannibals departure.

Ver fince the loffe of that battell at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Country of the Brutians, waiting for another supply from Carthage. The Roman Confuls that succeded unto Claudius and Livius, by whom Afdrubal was overcome and flaine, were contented to be quiet all their yeare. Neither did Liemins the Colleague of Scipie, ought worthy of remembrance against Hannibal, being hindred by the pestilence that was in his Army. Sempronius the Conful, who followed Licinius; and Cn. Servilius Capio, who followed Sempronius, were earnefly bent to have done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitlesse. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some the worse : and a few poore Townes they got from him; as it were by stealth; his care being more to preserve his Armie, than to keep those places that were weake.

The Romans had at this time for many great pieces of work in hand, that their chiefe enemy was become not the chief part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent upon Africk wherein they were at no small charges to maintaine the Army which (as was hoped) should bring the War to a short and happy conclusion. They stood neverthelesse in much feare of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who took exceeding pains among the Lin gurians and Gaules to raise an Army, wherewith to kindle anew the War in Italy, that began to waxe cold. Mage folicited afforthe Hetrurians, and found them fo ready to ftirre in his behal fe, that if he could have entred their Country strong, it might have proved no leffe needfull for Scipio to returne home out of Africk, than fhortly it was for Hannibal to make speedunto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romans to imploy one of their Confuls or Proconfuls, with an Army, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gaules; and a third among the Ligurians: for a fruch as it was uncertain, upon to which fide Mago would break out. Being thus bufied, it is no wonder though they forbore to overcharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in some readinesse for his setting forwards, he met in the Countrey of the Insurans, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconful, and P. Quintilius Varrus one of the Pretors. With these he fought a battell, where in though his vertue shewed it selfe worthy of his Father and Brethren; yet his fortune was Carthagim an. The fight continued along while doubtfull; in such fort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Pretor, taking unto him all the Roman Horse, thought to have shaken the Enemies to pieces. The Legions at the same time gave a loud shout: and strained themselves hard, as if at that brunt the victory should have been carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the service of those beasts being fitter for such use, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered over the field; their Riders being unable to manage them. Hereby the Numidians got advantage upon them: whose manner of fight was more availeable against those that were loose, than against the Troupes that were close and thick. Then fell the Elephants upon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a shoure of darts, and killed soure of them; causing all the rest to give back. This notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemy; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make refistance, they held their ground. The Proconful therefore brought up those forces, which he had kept unto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these, Mago imployed some of his Gaules, whom he had in readinesse for the like occasion. But the Gaules discharged their parts very ill. They were some beaten off, and recoiled so hastily, that they brought feare upon all the rest. When Mago sawthat his men began to shrinke, He pur himselfe in the head of his Army; and held them so well toit, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retrait, with their faces toward the Enemie. But at length hee received a grievous wound in his thigh; whereof shortly after hee dyed. He was taken up, and carried out of danger by some of his owne Tiiii men: the rest of them, after little further resissance, provided every one for himselse: So the Romans obtained victory, not without great cost: as purchasing the death of about five thousand enemies, with the losse of two thousand and three hundred of the Pretors Army, besides those that dyed of the Proconsuls Legions; also besides divers Colonels. Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this hot piece of service. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might affure them from pursuit. However it were, this victory would have much imported for the affurance of Italy, if the State of Carthage could longer have permitted these valiant sonnes of Amilear to abide therein. But Mage with-drawing himselse (by easie journies, because of his wound) 10 into Liguria, found there Embassadors from Carthage attending him : who gave him to understand the pleasure of their City, which was, That both he and Hannibal should prefently repaire home with all their forces; not staying any longer to think upon the conquest of Italy, since Carthage it selfe was ready to be lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and imbarqued shortly his Army; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage, to returne into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were ready to burst out, whilst the Embassadors were delivering their errand. When their message was done; He told them, That this was yet 20 plaine dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bid me come home, have long agoe done their best to bale me out of Italy; though more closely and crookedly they went to worke, by Ropping the supply that should have enabled me to mannage the Warre here. Scipio therefore Shallnot need to bragge, that hee bath drawne me home by the beeles : it is Hanno that bath wrought this noble feat; and overwhelmed the house of the Barchines, for lacke of other means to doe it, with the ruine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readinesse, doubting that which after came to passe: wherein he imbarqued, besides his owne men, as many of the Italians as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were, that shrunke back from him, and refused to doe service in this expedition of whom, such as he could take, he flew; not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Juno Lacinia, which 39 had been held an inviolable Sanctuary unto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italy no lesse passionate, than men are wont to be, when they leave their owne Countries to go into exile. He looked back unto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and cursing his ownedulnesse, in that he had not led his Army from Canna, hot and bloudied as it was, directly unto the walls of Rome. With fuch vexation of spirit He quitted the possession of Italy : wherein hee had lived almost halfe his time.

If it could have been foretold unto the Romans, in the first beginning of this Warre, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibalhis departure out of Italy: they would (I think) leffe earnestly have pressed the Car- 40 thaginians to fend him over thither. When fure advertisement was brought unto the Citie, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie: an Holy-day was appointed for thanksgiving unto their gods; and extraordinary great sacrifices publikely made, for joy of fuch happy tidings. Yet old 2. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remaine the fame, though the place were changed : for that Hannibal at his comming into Africk, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had been troubled with at any time before; and would doe greater matters in his owne Country, than ever he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. The remove of the War from their owne doores, and the conceit of that victory for which they hoped; was enough to make them prefume further, than at other times they would have done. When therefore the Sagnn-50 tine Embassadors brought unto them a great masse of Gold and Silver, together with fome Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spaine : onely the Carthaginian prifoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred back unto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Upon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies that had bin borrowed in time of more necessity from private men. Hence also proceeded the severe chastisement laid upon those 12. Colonies, that for want either of meanes or of good will, had refused to give aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and inforced to give double the number of Foot to that which they had been wont to let out for the Wars, with a proportion of Horle answerable to the very most of their ability. So confident were the Romans grown (though their wealth were not as yet futable to the greatnesse of their spirit) upon the good sixcesse of the battell at Metaurus, and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding when they confidered more nearely of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Army, whereof Italy had been few daies fince discharged, was landed fafe in — frick: they began to revolve a thousand fearfull matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, left 2. Fabius (who died about the fame time) would be found a true Prophet. For, bethinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax and Afdrubal no specialty of such great worth, as might promife the like fuccesse against another manner of Generall, followed by other manner of men, than were either of those two. The Numidian King had been wont to bring into the field a rascall multitude of halfe scullions, that were good for nothing; being himselfe afit Captaine for fuch Souldiers. Likewife Afdrubalthe fon of Gesco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise, one, that in the field was only good at faving himselfe by a swift retrait. But now there came an Army of men hardened from their childhood with incredible patience, fleshed many hundred times in Roman bloud, and wearing the spoyles, not only of good souldiers, but of brave Captaines, by them flaine. Such talke used the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet win battell with many that had flaine Roman Pretors, yea, and Confuls with their owne hands; with many that had been first in getting over the Trenches of severall Roman Camps, or in winning the tops of wals at the fiege of Towns; briefly, that he should now be opposed by an Army, as good as ever had served in War, and following the dreadfull name of Hannibal.

6. X X I.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treats with him about peace in vaine; lofeth a battell at Nadagara, and persivades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

TAnnibal disembarqued his Army at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercurie, and somewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italy. Therefore it behooved him to land, as he did, somewhat farre from the Enemy; that he might furnish himselfe of these and the like needfull helpes against the day of battell. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the In-land Country, gathering friends unto him by the way. Tychaus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was faid to have in those dayes the best Horo les of service, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure unto his partie: making him understand, that if the Romans got the victory, it should be easie for Mafanissa, by their countenance and helpe to oppresse both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindered his prospect. This argument, and the same of him that used it, prevailed with Tychaus ; who shortly after brought unto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further addes, That MeZetullus, (the same who had made himselse Protector over Majanissa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and adverse to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought to Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise, that Verming the Son of Sypahx, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdome, began at the same time to affaile the places that yeelded obedience to Masanissa. This Vermine, as we finde in Livie, came with more than 16. thouland men (for he lost more than so many) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in fuch hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were ; that they could not attend the leifure of those preparations, which would have made the victory affured. When they confidered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatnesse of his Acts: it offended them to thinke, that they had beene sobase as to make humble suit unto the Romans for peace; whilest they had such a brave Championalive, to maintaine their cause by Warre. But when as they bethought themselves of their owne sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to endure them, appeared greater than indeed they were: then cried they out earnestly, that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles. either good or bad : and to this purpose they sent their Mandates to Hannibal : requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but fince he was Generall of their forces, He thought it reasonable that they should suffer him to doe as a Generall ought to doe; and to choose his owne times. Neverthelesse, to give them satisfation, He made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce made by the Carthaginians: The violence done to his Embaf- 10 fadors: and the newes of Hannibal his being landed in Africk, made Scipio to understand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld unto any conditions unprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make refistance. Wherefore he sent unto Majanissa: and informed him of all that was fallen out; praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other businesse apart. Ten Roman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Mafamiffa had with him; that were lent unto him by Scipio, to doe him fervice in the establishing and inlarging of his Kingdome. But he well understood, that those and many more besides all his owne forces, would but little availe him; if Hannibal should drive the Romans out of Africk. Wherefore taking such order as he could upon the sudden, for the safety of his owne kingdome; with foure thousand Horse, and fixe thousand Foot, he made all hafte unto Scipio.

Sooneafter the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadors that had been at Rome, returned back under the conduct of Lalius and Fulvius: who brought them fafe into the Roman Campe. There when they arrived, and understood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaved themselves towards the Roman Embassadors: they made little doubt, how their owne heads should answer for such notorious outrage. To confirme them in this opinion:

M. Babius one of the late Embassadors that had bin in Carthage, being left by Scipioto take charge of the Camp, laid hands upon them and detained them; fending word unto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make Warre in the Country, that he had them in 30 his power, and that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their owne Coyne, for the injurie by them lately done . Scipio was very glad to heare of this; and commanded Babias to use them with all possible courtesie, and send them safe home. By thus doing, He brake the hearts of his enemies; and caused them to acknowledge themselves (which was a great victory) far leffe honourable than the Romans. This notwithstanding, he made more cruell War upon them than before : taking their Townes by force; and putting them to facke, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they took a Town by affault, to put all that came in their way to the fword, what sever they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselves terrible: and the betterto worke such impression in the mindes of those, with whom they had to doe, they used of-40 tentimes to kill the very Dogges and other Beafts, that ran athwart them in the streets; hewing their bodies afunder, as men delighted in shedding of bloud. This being their pra-Ctice at other times: it is likely that now they omitted no piece of cruelty; when they meant to give proofe of their vehement indignation, and revengefull minds, for the injuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so carnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Hannibal being incamped at Zama, sent forth his Scowts and Spies, to discover where the Romans lay, what they were doing, and as much a might be, of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, & brought unto Scipio: who in stead of trussing themup, gave them free leave to view his Campear pleasure, appointing one to conduct them up and 50 downe, and shew them whatsoever they defired. This done, Hee gave them leave to depart; and fent them away fafe unto their Generall. Hannibal understanding this, admired the bravery and courage of his enemy: with whom on the fudden he grew defirous to have an Enter-view, and personall conference, and fignified so much unto him by a mesfenger fent of purpole. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned answer, that Hee would meete him shortly in a place convenient. The next day Masanisa came with his Army : whom Scipio taking with him, removed unto a Towne called Nadagara; neare unto which he sate downe, in a place otherwise commodious, and close by a water that might opportunely ferve his Campe. Thence he fent word unto the Carthaginian, That the time and place did fitly ferve, if he had ought to fay to him. Hannibal thereupon removed from Zama, and came within foure miles of the enemy: where he incamped well to his owne good liking in all things elfe; excepting that his men were driven to take much paines, in fetching their water fomewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generals each of them with a troupe of Horse, rode forth of their Campes, till they came unto a piece of ground; which was before well fearched for feare of ambush. There they will their followers to stand off: and themselves with each of them one Interpreter, encountred each other in the mid-way o betweene their Companies. They remained a while filent, viewing one the other with mutuall admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginian, faluting the Roman, to deliver his minde to this effect: That it had been better both for Carthage, and Rome, if they could have limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Africk and of Italy; for that the Countries of Sicil and of Spaine, about which their fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for so many Fleets as had been lost, and of fo much bloud as had been shedde, in making those costly purchases. But fince things past could not bee recalled: He said, That it was meet for them to consider, unto what extreme dangers their owne Cities had been exposed, by the greedy defire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was even time for them now at length, to make io an end of their obstinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisedome hereaster. And to such peaceable disposition, Hee affirmed that his owne yeares, and long tryall of Fortune, both good and evill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience, might rather fixe his minde upon uncertaine hopes, than upon the contemplation of that mutability, whereto all humane affaires are subject. Tet (faid he) mine owne example may peradventure suffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that same Hannibal who after my vistorie at Canna won the createst part of Italie: and devised with my selfe, what I should doe with your City of Rome, which I hoped verily to have taken. Once I brought mine armie to your walls, as thou half since brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, see the change! I stand here ontreating thee to grant us peace. This may ferve as a document of Fortunes instability. I have fought with thy father Scipio: He was the first of the Roman Generalls that ever met me in the field. I did then little think, that the time would come, that I (hould have such businesse, as now at the present, with his son. But this is even one of Fortunes pageants. whereof she hath many. And thou maist have experience of the like in thy selfe, who knows how soone. Thinke upon M. Atilius: If he would have hearkened unto such perswassions, as I now use to thee, he might have returned home to Rome an happy man, and so maist thou doe now if any reasonable offer will give thee satisfaction. How saift thou? Canst thou bee contented, that all Spaine, Sicil, Sardinia, and what foever Ilands else are situate between Italie and Africk be abandoned by the Corthaginians for ever, and left unto the Romans. to bear dominion therein? Thou shalt have glory enough by effecting thus much: and the Romanes may well be glad of such a bargaine. As for mour owne quiet shall henceforth give us contentment. And the same contentment of ours shall make us faithfully observe the peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too little, I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazzard thou must undergoe for obtaining a very little more, than that which thou maift have without contention. It is now in thine owne power to lay hold upon good fortune, if it please thee: stay but untill to morrow night, and thou maist take such fortune as it please the gods. The issue of battaile is uncertain, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and steele we shall each of us bring into the field; but of the victory neither of us hath assurance. Let us therefore without more adoe make peace. And doe not tell mee that some false-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in the like treaty: It 18 I Hannibal that now defire peace with thee which I would never doe if I thought it not expedient for my country. And thinking it expedient. I will alwaies maintaine it like as I have maintained, unto my power, as long as the gods did not envie me, the war by me begun.

Hereunto Scipio made answer, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Scicil and in Spaine which had moved the Romans to enter into this or the former Warre: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to put on those armes; which the gods by the finall issue of the Warres had approved, and would approve to bee most just. As for the mutability of Fortune, he faid, that hee was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of insolence or over-weening, he might well refuie the conditions offered. For was it not plaine that all these Countries, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were already won from the Romans ? If, said he, these conditions had bin propounded whilest as yet ye detained some part of Italy, they might peradventure not have bin rejected. But as the case no stands, I see no reason why I should remit unto you any one piece of these my former demands, to which the Carthaginians have yeelded already, and thought me to be gracious in dealing so moderately. Rather I say, that the injuries which they have done me since. have made them unworthy of obtaining peace upon so friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, Hannibal, though thou wouldst be glad to make thy Citizens understand, from how 10 much of their burden they are by thy meanes eased. Onely thou must thinke that in like fort it concernes me in honour not to let them begainers or favers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knowest well, that besides those offers which thou here hast made they were wel contented to restore unto us ransome-free, all prisoners that they have of ours to pay us five thou fand talents , to deliver up their gallies, and to deliver hoftages for affurance of faire dealing . And must they now be discharged of all this by their breach of truce, their spoiling of our fleet, and their violating our Embassadors? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these injuries newly donesthen will I take advice with my counsell what answer to give yousotherwise you may even prepare forwarre, and blame your own selves for that I have denied you peace. 20

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre ; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battell, wherein should be decided the quarrell betweene Rome and Carthage. The next morning at break of day they iffued into the field: a notable march, and fuch as hath very feldome been found; whether we regard the Generals, their Armies, the two Cities that contended, or the great importance of the battell at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastari, divided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance between them: Not farre behind these followed the Principes, likewise divided; and so after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinary custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite unto the voyd spaces 30 between the Haftati, that so the Hastati, as was usuall, might fall back between the Principes; but he placed them directly one behind another, as it were, in File. This he did, because of the Elephants, whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was lesse whilest there was open way to let them through. Therefore he took such order, that when they had paffed through the spaces betweene the first Battalions, they should not come upon the Principes in Front Unto his Velites, or those of the light armature that were to begin the fight, he gave direction, that when they found themselves to be over-charged, either by the Enemies, or (which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should run back through those lanes that were betweene the Maniples; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, un- 40 till they were got behind all their owne Army; thereby leaving roome enough unto those that were wounded, or cast behind, to save themselves on the void ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third battels, without cloying up the way betweene the Maniples, which he defired to keep open. His Italian horse he placed in the left wing, under C. Lalius. In the right wing was Masanissa with his Numidians. He himselfe riding up and downe, exhorted his men to doe valiantly; using words, not many, but forcible. He bade them remember what they had atchieved, fince their comming into Africk. He told them, that if this day were theirs, the Warre was at an end : and that their victory in this War, should make them Lords of all the World, for that afterwards, nonewould be found able to refift them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he 50 asked them whither they would flie. They were farre from home, yea, and far from their owne standing Campe: neither was there any place in Africk, that would give them shelter: if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but death or victory: unlesse they would live like wretched flaves under most mercilesseenemies. In such necessity, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take resolution answerable thereunto, have never been knowne to faile of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other fide placedhis Elephants, that were more than fourescore, in Front of his Battell. Next behind these, he made his Vantguard all of Mercenaries, Liqurians, Gaules, Baleares, and Moores. Then followed his Battell; which was of Caribaoinians & Africans, more interessed in the quarrell than were those Mercenaries; though not so good souldiers: but to helpe (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them foure thousand Macedonians, lately fent from King Philip. More than the space of a furlong behinde these came his Rereward, confishing of those brave Souldiers which had ferved him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lalius, in his owne right wing he bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tycheus and the Numidians he placed in his lest wing against Masanisa. He was indeed farre too weake for the Enemie in horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For 10 Tycheus and Mezetullus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercifed as were the foure thousand of Masanisa. The Caribaginians also were no more, nor none other than fuch as could be levied in the hafte of a few dayes; and the remainder of those, that had of late been often vanquished, and accustomed to flye. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authoritie, to make these his companions alight and serve on foot, setting better men in their saddles. All that he could have done, was to flay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Vermina the fon of Syphax come this ther, as he did in few dayes after, with fixteene thousand and upwards, the most of them Horse, the advantage of number might have served well to supply all other defect. Yet fince the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay, Hannibal must be faine to comfort himselfe with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian souldiers; whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their feverall conditions: promifing unto the Mercenaries bountifull rewards; threatning the Carthaginians with inevitable fervitude if they loft that day: but especially animating his old fellow-fouldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against farre greater numbers. He bade them to looke upon the Enemies, and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Army which they had flaughtered at Canne. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio even the father of this man, whom they had first of all compeloled to runne away. He told them, that these Legions, which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very worst of the Roman Souldiers; even such as for their daftardly flight out of fundry battels, could no longer be trufted to beare Armes in their owne Countrie. As for the rest, they were young men, the sons of Cowards, and bred up in the continual feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slain or chafed. Wherefore he entreated these his old companions, upon whose vertue he meant wholly to repose himselfe, that they would this day strive to make good their honour; and to purchase the same of men invincible.

Such exhortations used the two Generals before the fight. When they drew neere together the Numidian horsemen on both sides began to skirmish. The Trumpets and other inftruments of warre, founded to battell: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to breake upon the Romans. Of these Elephants (as they were alwayes an uncertaine kind of help) those that stood neere unto the point of the left wing, turned back for feare: and ran upon their own Numidian Horse; which they affrighted and disordered. Masanissa efpying this, gave charge upon the same Numidians; and not suffering them to re-ally them felves drave them quite out of the field. The rest of those beasts made a great spoile of the Roman Velites, whom they followed into the spaces betweene the Maniples: but without any harm to the Battalions themselves; which gave them open way, accordingly as Seipie had well provided. Divers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be governed; but ran backe upon the right point of their owne battell, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they difordered the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing : against whom they gave to Lalin the same advantage that Masanisa had against the Numidians; which heused in like fort. In the meane while, the battels of foot advanced, and drew neere together with a flow and wately pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast: at what time they gave a shour, and ran one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time seemed both in audacitie, and in quicknesse, to have the better of the Romans; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they took. But the Roman discipline after a while prevailed against the boisterous violence of these untrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battel of the Principes, following somewhat neere after the Hastaizencouraged their fellowes: and shewed themselves ready, if need were, to relieve them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries received no manner of helpe or comfort, from those that should have seconded them. For the new-levied Carthaginians and Africans, when they faw their hired fouldiers give back, did also themselves retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gaules, and the rest. to thinke themselves betrayed: whereupon they enclined unto slight. The Carthaginian Battell was herewith more terrefied than before, fo as it refused to give way unto the Mercenaries for their fafe retrait; and yet withall forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chased by the Romans, and betrayed, as to they thought, by their owne fellowes, to turne their armes with an heedlesse sure gainst both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten downe and flaine, through their owne indifcretion, by their owne Mercenaries. The Roman Hastari in like fort, fighting with desperate men in a throng, had their hands so full of worke, that the Principes were faine to come up unto them, and helpe to over-beare this great medley of enemies, that were together by the eares among themselves. In this place was made a great flaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Caribaginians: which, hindering one another, could neither fight, nor eafily flye. Such of them as escaped, ranne towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foot, to helpe or fave these Run-awayes. He caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his 20 owne fide, that would have rushed upon him: whom he thereby compelled to turneafide beyond his Battell, and fave themselves in the open field. The ground, over which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meet with Hannibal, was covered with heapes of dead bodies and weapons; and so slipperie with bloud, that Scipio began to standing reat doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should be dissolved in passing that way. In such case, if he should fight with that warlike Armie, which hee saw before him, remaining yet entire, and without feare expecting him; He might bee well affured to receive a notable overthrow. He caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite to the maine battell of the Hannibalians. Then drawing up his Principes and Triarii, he placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in 20 one Front with the Hastatz, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he advanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than ever he had beene received in his life before. All the dayes worke till now, seemed to have been a matter of pastime, in regard of the sharpe Conflict, that was maintained betweenethese notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged by their having prevailed all the day before: they were also farre the more in number. But these old Souldiers of Hannibal were fresh; (and perhaps) the better men. They fought with such obstinate resolution, that no man gave backe one foot; bur rather chose to die on the ground whereon he stood. So that, after a long time, it was uncertaine which part had the worse: unlesse it may seeme, that the Romans were beginning to shrinke; for as much as the returne of 40 Masanissand Lalius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to have beene most hap-Eactept.è Pol. pie and in a needfull time. These upon a sudden charged the Hannibalians in Rere; and over-bearing them by meere violence-compelled them to fall to Rout.

In this Battell there died of the Romans fifteene hundred and upwards: on the Carthaginian fide, above twenty thousand; befides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Captain of the Macedonians was one. The fingular skill that Hannibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was accknowledged, as Livie reports, by Scipio himselfe. But the Enemies were too strong for him in Horse: and being enjoyned, as he was, by the State of Carthage, to take battell with fuch disadvantage, he could worke no marvels. He faved himselfe with a few Horse; and stayed not in his 50 journey, till he came to Adrumerum. Thence was he fent for to Carthage; from which he had beene absent sixe and thirtie yeeres. At his comming into the Senate, He said plainly, That there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians not knowing what other course to take, resolved to send Embassadours againe, and trie the favour of Scapio, whose Armes they could not now re-

Scipia having spoyled the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Utica: where he found P. Lentulm newly arrived, with fifty Gallies and an hundred Ships of burden. With this this Fleet, and that which he had before, He thought it best to make towards Caribage: rather of purpose to terrefie the Citie, than with any hope to take it. His Legions he committed unto Cn. Offavius whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then fending Lalius away to Rome with newes of the victory, fet faile from Utica towards Carthage. He was encountred on the way by ten Embaffadours from the City: who bearing up with the Admirall Gallie began to use the pitiful gesture of suppliants. But they received none other answer than that they should meet him at Tunes, where he would give them audience. So rowing along before the City, and viewing it more in bravery, than with meaning to attempt it; He returned back to Wicca, and called backe Offavius thither, o with whom in person He set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journy thither, they heard the newes, that Vermina the sonne of Syphax, was comming with an Army of more Horse than Foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Vermina feemes to have bin both carelesse of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defective in all other duties requifite in the Commander of an Army. Part of the Roman foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not onely beat him, but fo compasse him in, that he hardly escaped himselfe with a few; leaving fifteene thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelve hundred taken prisoners. If this good company had bin with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should have been far better conducted, and might well have changed the Fortune of the day; which the o Carthaginian lost by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to be doubted, that this victory, though it were no great accesse unto the former; yet served well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embassadours from Carthage: whose behaviour, though it was more pitifull than it had bin before, yet procured it lesse commisseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like fort humbled themselves. Nevertheleffe it was confidered, what a long and laborious work it would prove, to beliege the mightie Citie of Carthage. And particularly, Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honour of this warre, if it were protracted, should be taken out of his hands, and given to one of the Confuls. Cn. Servilius Capio, that Conful who had charge of the war against Hannibal, at fuch time as he departed out of Italy: was bold to passe over into the Ile of Secul (as it were in chase of Hannibal by him terrefied and driven away) with a purpose thence to have proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the command of the Army there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to restraine the ambition of this Consul Servilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made suite for the same Province of Africk: and was therein fo earnest, that though neither the Senate, nor People, would grant him his defire; yet he needs would be going, procuring onely leave of the Senate, that he being Conful might joyne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authority. But ere he could have his Fleet and all things in a readinesse for the journey, whereinno man cared to further him. Winter came on, and he was onely toft at Sea with to foule weather; first upon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Consulship expired, and so he returned home a private man. Then came the joyfull newes to Rome of the victory obtained against Hannibal, and that the warre was now even at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Confull so passionate in desiring Africk for his Province, That he faid he would fuffer nothing to passe in the Senate, untill he had first his will. Much adoe there was about this and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the people, at last it was ordered. That if Peace were granted, it should begranted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio should have command therein by Land, and the Conful at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to give the more favourable answer unto the Carthaginian Embassadours. He willed them to consider what they had deferved : and in regard thereof to think them felves well dealt with all; in that he was contented to leave unto them their libertie and their owne Lawes, without appointing any Governour over them, or Garrison to hold them in subjection; leaving also unto them their possessions in Africk, such as they were at the beginning of this war. Astouching the rest he was at a point, That, before he either granted them peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilest the late Treaty was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yeeld, then required He, That immediatly they should deliver up to the Romans all prisoners fugitives, and reneg ado's, that they had of theirs: likewife all their Gallies, excepting ten: and all their Elephants. That they should make no warre at all thence-forth out of Africke, neither yet within Africke, without licence of the Romans: That the Countries, Townes, goods what soever, belonging any mife unto Mafanissa, or to any of his Ancestors, which were in their possession, Should be all by them restored unto him : That they should finde corne for the Roman Army, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, untill the Peace were fully concluded: That they Should pay tenne thousand Talents of Silver, in the terme of sifite yeeres, by two hundred Talents a yeare; and that for observance of Conditions, they should give an hundred hostages: such as Scipio would choose, being none of them under four eteene yeeres of age, nor above

With these conditions the Embassadours returned home, and reported them unto 10 the Citie. They were very unpleafing; and therefore one Gesco stood up to speake against them: and exhorted the people, who gave good attention, that they should not condescend unto such intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiving this, and noting withall what favourable audience was given to this vaine Oratour, by the unquiet, yet unwarlike Multitude, was bold to pull him downe from his standing, by plaine force. Hereat all the People murmured, as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by fuch infolence of this prefumptuous Captain. Which Hannibal perceiving, role up and spake unto them, saying; That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwise than the customes of the Citie would allow; for a finuch as he had been thence absent ever fince he was a Boy of nine yeeres old, untill he was now a man of five and forty. 20 Having thus excused himselfe of the disorder, he discoursed unto them concerning the Peace: and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting abilitie to defend themselves, had the Demands of the Enemie beene yet more rigorous. Finally, upon good advice, they resolved to yeeld unto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they paid out of hand five and twenty thousand pounds weight in filver, in recompence of damages, and injuries by them done to his Fleet and Embaffadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths, in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall he gave injunction, that they should neither in the meane while send Embassadours any whither else, nor yet dismisse any Embassadours to them fent, without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their 30

Atthistime Hanne, and they of his Faction, were become wife and honourable men, errand was. by the miseries whereinto Garthage was fallen through their malicious counsels. Afdrubal, surnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and a great friend of Hanno, was chiefe of the Embaffages which they fear to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scapio his Embaffadours, who related unto the Senate and People these joyfull newes. About the fame time arrived at Rome Embaffadours from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to waite a while for audience, till the election of new Confuls then in hand was finished; and order taken, for the provinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embaffadors 40 called into the Senate: who first answering unto some points, wherein the Romans had lately fignified unto their King, that they found themselves grieved; returned the blame upon those Greeks themselves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they Marcin Aurelius: who being one of the three Embaffadours, that had lately been fent from Rome unto King Philip, tarried in Greece behind his fellowes, and there leviingmen, made warre upon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betweent him and the Romans. Further they defired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Muerdonian Gentleman, with other of their Countri-men, that had lately ferved Hannibalfor Pay; and being taken prisoners in Africke, were kept in bonds by Sapio, might betelesfed and delivered unto them. Unro all this M. Furius, whom Aurelin had fent 50 to Rome for that purpole, made a sharp answer. He faid, that the Greekes which were confederate with Rome, endured formany injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to flay behinde, to help them as he might; which elle were like to be brought under the Kings subjection. As for Sopater, he affirmed him to be one of the Kings Counfell, and very inward with him: one that served nor formoney, but carried money wich him, and four thousand men, fent from the King to the aid of Hannibal. About these points, when the Macedonian Embassadours could make unto the Senate no good answer, they were willed to return, and tell their Master; That warre he fought, and war he should find, if he proceeded as he had begun. For in two maine points He had broken the League, that was between him and the Romans: first, in that he had wronged their Confederates; and secondly in that he had ayded their Enemies against them with men and money.

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Easterne Countries, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadours in their solicitation of Peace They appeared a very reverend company, when they entred into the Senate: and Aldrubal above the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romans from necessity of sending Embassadours to Carthage, upon the like errand. He liberally granted, that the justice of the quarrell had beene wholly on the Romans side; faving, that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuse the Citie that had beene too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsell. But if Hanno and himselfe might have had their wils, the Carthaginians, even at the best of their Fortune, should have granted the peace which they now defired. Herewithall he commended the moderation of the Romans, as no small argument of their valour; by which alwayes they had beene victorious. To the same effect spake the rest of the Embassadours : all of them entreating to have the Peace ratisfied; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diversity of their stile. They had patience enough to endure such reproofe of Perjury, as they themfelves might have laid upon the Romans; if their diligence and fortune had been fuch as the Romans was. Among the rest, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would sweare to keepe the peace hereafter: Asdrubal made answer; Even by the same gods, that are so severe unto those that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Conful, interposing the authoritie of his office, would have hindred the Senate from proceeding unto conclusion of peace; for that hereby he was like to lose the honour, which he purposed to get by making warre in Africke. But the matter was propounded unto the people, in whom rested the Soveraign Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly unto the pleafure of the Senate. So it was decreed. That Scipio. with tenne Delegates, sent unto him from Rome of purpose, should make a League with the Caribaginians, upon fuch Conditions as feemed best: which were none other, than the fame which he had already propounded. For this favour the Carebaginian Embaffadours humbly thanked the Senate; and craved licence, that they might visite their Countrimen, which were prisoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ransome and carry home with them some that were their especiall friends; of whom they gave in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadours world choose, should be sent over into Africk, and be freely restored to liberty by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they took leave, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joyne with Scipio in commission.

At their comming into Africk, the Peace was given, and accepted, without any controversie or disputation. The Prisoners, Fugitives, and Renegado's, were delivered up to Scipio: likewife the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio took more vengeance upon the Renegado's, than upon the Fugitives; and upon those of the Romans, than upon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded the Romans he crucified. About the first payment of their money the Carihaginians were formewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasurie could have spared two hundred Talents for the present; yet fince the penfion was annuall, and to continue fiftie yeeres; it was thought meet to lay the burden upon the Citizens. At the collection of the fumme there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman yoke had begun to pinch them; fo as many, even of the Senatours, could not forbeare weeping. Contrariwife, Hannibal could not refraine from laughter. For which when he was checked by Afdrubal Hadm, and told, That it worst of all beseemed him to laugh, fince he had bin the cause why all others did weep; He answered. That laughter did not alwaies proceed from joy; but sometimes from extremity of indignation: Yet, said He, My laughter is more seasonable, and lesse absurd, than Your teares. For ye (bould have went when ye gave up your (hips and Elephants, and when Je bound your own hands from the use of armes without the good leave of the Romans first obtained. This miserable condition keeps us under, and holds us in assured servitude. But of these matters yee had no feeling. Non when a little money is wrung out of your private purses, ye have thereof some sense. God grant that thetime come not hereafter, wherein yee Shall acknowledge, that it was the very least part of your misery for which ye have shed these teares. Thus discoursed Hannibal unto those, who, tasting the bitter fruits of their own malicious counsell, repented when it was too late; and in stead of cursing their own disorders, which had bred this grievous disease, accused the Physician, whose noble endevours had bin employed in procuring the remedie.

Scipio being totake leave of Africk, produced Masanista, and magnified him in prefence of the Armie, with high commendations not undeservedly. To him also he configned over those towns of King Syphax, which the Romans at that present held: wherein to fay truth, he gave him but his due; and that which other wife he knew not well how 10 to bestow. But the love of the Romans, & friendship of Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the deservings of this Numidian King. About Carihage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarqued themselves for Sicil: where when they arrived at Lilybaum, Scipio with some part of his Army tooke his way home to Rome by land; and fent the reft before him thither by Sea. His journy through Italy was no leffe glorious than any triumph: all the people thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to doe him honour as he passed along. He entred the Citie in Triumph: neither was there ever before, or after, any triumph celebrated with fo great joy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in bravery of the pompe, there were others in time Thortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the Citie 26 in this Triumph, and died soone after in prison; or whether he were dead a while before; it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be avowed. That it was a barbarous custome of the Romans, to infult over the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph ; yea, though they were such, as had alwayes made faire and courteous warre. But hereof we shall have better example ere the same age passe. It was neither the person of syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grievous warre past, whereof the Romans had bin in a manner without hope that ever they should fee Italy free. This made them looke cheerefully upon the Author of so great a conversion; and filled them with more joy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gave to Scipio the 30 Title of the African: stilling him by the name of that Province which he had subdued. This honourable kinde of furname, taken from a conquered Province, grew afterwards more common, and was usurped by men of lesse desert: especially by many of the Cafars, who fometimes arrogated unto themselves the title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if fuch glorious Attributes could have made them like in vertue unto Scipio the African.

hath bin affigned as a probable cause. For fince Nature is confined unto a subject that is not unbounded; the workes of Nature must needs be finite, & many of them refemble one the other. Now in those actions, that feem to have their whole dependance upon the will of man, wee are less

F the great fimilitude found in worldly events, the limitation of matter to wonder, if we finde lesse varietie: since it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious unto humane power; and fince they are the fame affections, by which the wills of fundrie men are over-ruled, in managing the affaires of our daily life. It may be observed in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans invaded the Kingdome of the Medes, with two hundred thoufand Foot, and threescore thousand Horse: but failing in their intended conquest, they became subject within a while themselves unto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Daring, and after him Xerxes, fell upon the Greekes with fuch number of men, as might have feemed refiftlesse. But after that the Persians were beaten home againe, their Empire was never fecure of the Greekes: who at all times of leifure from intestine Warre, to devised upon that conquest thereof, which finally they made under the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonofor with his rough old Souldiers, had undertaken the Medes; or Cyrun with his well-trayned Armie, had made attempt upon Greece; the iffue might, in humane reason, have beene farre different. Yet would it then have beene expedient for them to employ the travell and vertue of their men, rather than the greatnesse of their names, against those people; that were no lesse valiant, though lesse renowned than their owne. For the menacing words used by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greekes (in which kinde it may be, that Nabuchodonofor likewife offended the Medes and Persians) were not so availeable to victory, as to draw on revenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the old Lyon, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kickt by the Asse. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by misse-understanding the language of Fame; and defpifing the vertue that makes little nov fe, adventure to provoke it against themselves; as if it were not possible that their owne glorie should be foiled by any of lesse-noted excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Exilmerodach, had flumbled; Pyrrhuthe Epirot hath dasht his foot. He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of marke, and a better Souldier than any other Greekilb King, when he entred into warre against the Romans. This warre he undertooke as it were for his minds fake: having received no injurie; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greekes that ferved under him, to prevaile to fo easily against the barbarous Romans, that they should onely serve as a step to his further intended conquests, of Sicil and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory against Pyrrhu, had found their owne vertue to be of richer metall, than was the more fhinning valour of the Greekes: then did all the bravery of the Epyrot (his Elephants and what foever else had ferved to make him terrible) ferve only to make the Romans, in time following, to thinke more highly of themselves. * For since they had overcome the best *The King of Warriour in Greece, even Him, that, being thus beaten by them, could in a yeere after tended invinmake himselse Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should hinder them from the con-cible Narie, quest of all those unwarlike Provinces, which in compasse of 12. yeeres a Macedonian being beaten King of late memory had wonne? Certainly there washereunto requifite no more, than ith seas, invito bring to their owne devotion by some good meanes, the whole Country of Greece: ted us to those all the rest, this done, would follow of it selfe. How to deale with the Greekes, Philip having broken and Alexander had shewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learne, by the greatest getting more acquaintance with the Nation. When therefore the first Punicke warre was ended, which followed soone after the gathered togewars of Fyrrhus and of the Tarenines: then were the Romans at good leifure to hearken ther, we never after newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occasion, that should be on that side of any of his presented. They had also then a strong Fleet: and were become , though not otherwise preparations very skilfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wi- after that time; shed, that the Illyrian Queene Tenta made at the same time cruell war upon the Greekes: wasting their Countrey, and sacking their Townes, onely because they were unable to refift, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romans were defi-Lib.5, cap.2.5.7. rous to enter; the Queene was not flow to give them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that warre which they made with Her, was, in their own opinion, a matter not unworthy to make their Patronage to bee defired by the Greekes. But no fuch thing happened: though they fent Embassadours, as it were to offer themselves; by fignifying, that for love of Greece they had undertaken this Illyrian warre. Thus beganne the first acquaintance betwixt the Greekes and Romans: which afterwards encreased very hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose businesse with with them, being now the subject of our storie, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions. It was like to prove a bufie time in the world, when, within the space of 4-yeers, new Kings began to reign in the most of all Countries knowne; and 3. of them young boyes, in 3. of the greatest Kingdomes. This hapned from the third yeere of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad. unto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus Kino of Asia and Syria, in whose roome succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the Great. Ptolomy Philopater succeded in the Kingdome of Egypt unto his father Euergetes. And Philip the fonne of Demetrius, being 16:0r 17. yeeres old, received the Kingdom of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Acheans & most of the Greekes; by the decease of his Uncle Amigonus Doson, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedamon, and the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then began his reigne in Cappadocia. Lycurgu found means to make himselse King over the Lacedamonians, whose Commonweale, fince the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headleffe; and Acham. a kinsman of Antiochue, but a Rebell unto him, occupied the Regions neere unto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third yeers of the 100 and fortieth Olympiad it was that open war brake out between Rome & Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Invafion upon Italy. Those troubles of the We-Antiochus, Ptolomy, & the rest, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

fterne world, which were indeed the greatest, we have already followed unto an end: Of 20 Philip, soone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus; greatly defired of the Acheans, and many others his dependants. That Country, having freed it selfeby the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subjection unto Cleamenes: was now become no leffe obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should have beene to the Spartan; & therewithall it lay open unto the violence of the Aetolians; who despised even the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. The Aesolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted unto any other Art than war. Therefore wanting employment, they fell upon the Meffenians that were their owne Clients, and (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their confanguinity) the onely good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their invasion was no lesse unexpected, than it was unjust: whereby with greater case they made spoile of the Countrey; finding none prepared to make refistance. The Achaans, were called by the Messenians to help: which they did the more willingly; because the Aetolians passing without leave through their Territory, had (as was their manner) done what harme they lifted. Old Aratus could hardly abide these Aetolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembring the injuries; wherewith most ingratefully they had requited no small benefits done to them by the Achaens. He was therefore so hastie to fall upon this their Army, that he could hardly endure to ftay few daies untill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Prætor of the Acheans for the yeere following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himselfe a man fitter (as hath beene already noted of him) for any other fervice, than leading of an Army. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their booties through a part of the Countrey, wherein he might very eafily have distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neere, when they had recovered ground of advantage, that they eafily defeated all his Armie. So they departed home rich, and well animated to returne againe. As for the Acheans, they got hereby onely the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made Confederacy. Shortly after, the Aetolians invaded Peloponnesus againe; having no more to doe, than to passe over the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulph of Lepanto, where they might land in the Countrey of the Eleans. 50 There joyned with them, in this their fecond invalion, a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that Condition imposed upon them by the Romans, of setting out no ships of war unto the coast of Greece: made bold to seek adventures againe, & did great mischiese. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of the Komans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdome, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, & fell upon the Ilands of the Cyclades in the Aegean sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip, or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians under Scerdilaidas, or Scerdileius, having gotten what they could else-where by roving at Sea, accompanied the Enlians into Peloponnessu: who made greater havocke in the Countrey now, than in their former Expedition, and returned home, without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made unto Philip, when he came to Corinih. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselves with some speedy revenge: there were that urged to have some grievous punishment layd upon the Laced emonians; who were thought under-hand to have favoured the Liolians, in meere despight of the Acheans and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately beene subdued. It is true, that the Laced amanians had been fo affected: & (which was worse) at the arrivall of Philips they flew fuch friends of his, as having checked their inclination, feemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to judgement: but intreated the King, that he would abstaine from comming to them with an Army: fince their Towne was lately much disquieted with civill discord, which they hoped foone to appeale, and meant alwayes to remaine at his devotion. Philip was eafily fatisfied with this : not for that he(or rather old Aratus, who then wholly governed him) did mif-understand the Laced amonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in prefence of the King, the Embafsadours of the Acheans, Boestians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining upon the Ætolians and defiring to have war decreed against them, by common affent. Philip sent his letters unto the Aulians, requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time: if they could alledge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpose: whither if it pleased him to come, or fend, he should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have beene there at the day. But when the Ætolians understood this for certaine, they adjourned the Councell unto a further time: faying, That fuch weighty matters ought not to be handled, fave in the great Parliament of all Actolia. This tricke of Law notwithstanding, open war was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how wel they had deserved it made election of Scopas to be their Prætor, that was Author of these Invasions made on Peloponnesse; and the onely man, o in a fort, upon whom they must have laid the blame of these actions, if they would have shifted it from the publike.

After this, Philip went into Macedon, where he prepared builty for the warre against the yeere following. He also affayed the Illyrian, Scerdilaidas, with faire words and promiles; whom he easily won from the Atolian fide, forafmuch as the Atolians had couzened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like fort the Acheans, who had first of all others proclaimed the warre in their owne Countrey, fent unto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messenians, and Laced amonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce war unto the Etolians; without staying (as it were) to await the event. Hereunto they received divers answers according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free-hearted and valiant though a small Nation, and bordering upon the Atolians, of whom they stood in continual danger; faid, that they could not honeftly refuse to shew their faithfull meahing in that warre, which was concluded by generall affent. The Epirors that were more mighty, were nevertheleffe more cunning and referved: fo that they ftood upon a needleffe point, and defired to be held excused, until Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to have made any doubt) should first proclaime the war. The Messenians, for whose cause the warre was undertaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Towne which the Enlians held upon their borders, and faid, that they durft not be over-bold, untill that bridle were taken out of their mouths. As for the Laced amonians, the chiefe of them to fludied onely, how to mannage the treason, for which their City had beene so lately pardoned and therefore difmissed the Embassadours of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three yeeres together continued subject against their wills to the Macedonians, expecting still when Cleomenes should returne out of Egypt to reigne over them againe, and maintaine, as hee was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings, but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of these there were some, that thought the publike safety to confist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preferred them. And hereto they referred all their coun-Tailes: being perhaps a little moved with respect of the benefit, which might redound unto themselves, by adhering firmely to those which at the present bore rule over them. Others, and those the greater part, were still devising, how to make all ready for Cleomenes against his return; & sought to joyne with the Atolians, which were the most likely to give him strong affistance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority, and durst more freely speake their mindes: but the contrary side was the more passionate, ad spared not by murders or any other violent courses, to set forward their defire. Neither did it suffice, that about these times there came certaine report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which these intended: fancying unto themselves the glory of their Ancestors in such Ages past, as were not like to come againe. Cleomenes was, they knew, the most able man to restore them unto their greatnesse and lustre; which once hee had in a manner performed: But fince hee was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deferving vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would have, and those of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without fuch helpes, they must continue little better than subjects unto the Macedonian. and farre leffe by him respected, than were the Acheans. Thus were they transported by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working spirits among them, procured the Ltolians to fend an Embaffie to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly unto the people, whereof no one of the Citizens durst have made himselfe the Author. Much disputation, and hor, there was, betweene those of the Macedonian partie, and these their opposites: in such wise that nothing could be concluded; un- 20 till by maffacre or banishment of all, or the chiefe, that spake against the Ecolians, the diversity of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded betweene the Laced amonians and Etolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Acheans, who had spared the Citie, when they might have destroied it. Then also they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was so nice, and fo regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the choosing of the one King, that we may justly wonder, how they grew so carelesse in making choyce of the other. In the one of their Royall Families they found Agesipolis, the sonne of Agesipolis, the sonof King Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to reigne over them, as heire apparent to his grandfather. This Agespolis was a yong Boy, standing in neede of a Guardian : & had an 30 Uncle, his Fathers brother, that was fit for the Government. Yet because the Law required, that the some, how yong soever, should have his fathers whole right and title: the Laced amonians, though standing in neede of a man, were so punctuall in observation of the Law, that they made this childe their King, and appointed his Uncle Cleomenes to be his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royall Family, though there was no want of heires: yet would not the people trouble themselves about any of them, to examine the goodnesse of his Claime, but made election of one Lycurgus, who having no manner of title to the Kingdome, bestowed upon each of the Ephori, a Talent, and thereby made himselfe be saluted King of Sparia, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus, to gratifie his Partifans, and to approve his worth by acti- 40 on, invaded the Countrey of the Argives: which lay open and unguarded, as in a time of peace. There he did great spoile, and won divers Townes; whereof two he retained, and annexed unto the State of Lacedamon. After such open hostility, the Lacedamonians declared themselves on the Liolian side; and proclaimed warre against the Achæans.

Thus the beginnings of the warre fell out much otherwise, than the Acheans and their Consederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not ready: the Epirois gave uncertaine answer: the Messenians would not stirre: all the burden must lieupon themselves and the poore Acarnanians, whom the Etolians, by savour of the Eleans, could invade at pleasure, as they were like to doe; and by helpe of the Lacedamonians, could assale on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Etolians, passing over the Bay of Corinth, surprised the Towne of Egira: which if they could have held, they should thereby grievously have molested the Acheans, for that it stood in the mid-way between Egium and Sycion, two of their principall Cities, and gave open way into the heart of all their Countrey. But as Egira was taken by surprise: so was it presently lost againe, through greedinesse of spoile; whilest they that should have made it their first care, to assure the place unto themselves, by occupying the citades and other peeces of strength, fell heedlessy to ransacke private houses, and thereby gave the Citizens leave to make head; by whom they were driven with great flaughter backe unto their Fleet. About the fame time, another Ætolian Army landing among the Eleans, fell upon the Westerne Coast of Achaia; wasting all the Territory of the Dymeans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achean Consederacie. The Dymeans and their neighbours made head against these Invaders; but were so well beaten, that the enemy grew bolder with them than before. They sent for helpe unto their Prætor, and to all the Townes of their Society invaine. For the Acheans having lately been much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to do little of themselves: neither could they get any strength of Mercenaries; forasimuch as at the end of Cleomenes his warre, they had to covetously with held part of their due from those that served them therein. So through this disability of the Acheans, and insufficiency of their Prætor; the Dymeans, with others, were driven to with hold their contribution heretofore made for the publike service, & to convert the money to their own defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedemonians, began to win upon the Areadians, that were consederate with Philip & the Acheans.

Philip came to the borders of the Atolians, whilft their Army was thus employed a farre off in Pelpoonnesw. The Epirois joyned all their forces with him: and by such their willing readines, drew him to the fiege of a Frontier peece, which they defired to get into their own hands; for that, by commodity thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselves Masters of Ambracia. There he spent forty dayes, ere he could end the business which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirois. Had he entred into the heart of Etolia at his first comming in; it was thought that he might have had an end of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken upon small Towns or Forts: and not feldome, that the importunity of Affociates, to have their own defires fulfilled. converts the preparations of great Kings to those uses for which they never were intended; thereby hindering the profecution of their maine defignes. Thus was our King Henrie the eight led afide, & quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperor to the fiege of Tournay: at fuch time as the French King Lewis the twelfth, hearing that the ftrong City of Terwin was loft, and that his Cavallerie, wherein rested his chiefe confidence. two thousand were beaten by the Earle of Essex with seven hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himselfe into Brittaine, infeare that Henrie would have come to Paris

The flay that Philip made at Ambracus, did wondroufly emboldenthe Atolians: in fuch fort, as their Prætor Scopus adventured to leade all their forces out of the Country: and therewith not onely to over-runne Theffalie, but to make impression into Macedon: He ranne as farre as to Dium, a City of Macedon upon the Egean Sea: which, being forfaken by the Inhabitants at his comming, He tooke, and razed to the ground. He spared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildingstherein, but overturned all: and among the rest, he threw down the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Country-men at his returne; for a smuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be growne terrible, not onely (as before)unto Peloponnessus, but even to Macedon it selfe. But this their pride was soone abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their owne Countrey, for their paines taken at Dium. Philip having dispatched his worke at Ambracus, made a strong invasion upon Atolia. He tooke Phoetia, Metropolis, Oeniade, Paanium, Elaus, and divers other Towns and Castles of theirs: of which he burnt some, and fortified others. He also beat the Atolians in fundry skirmishes; and wasted all the Countrie over, without receiving any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut over the Streights into Peloponne sm, and to doe the like spoile in the Country of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently solicited by the Achaan Embassadours; newes came out of Macedon, that the Dardamans were ready with a great Armie to fall upon the Countrey. These Dardanians were abarbarous people, divided by Mount Hamus from the Northerne part of Macedon, & were accustomed to seeke booty in that wealthy Kingdome, when they found their own times. Having therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a journey into Pelo-Ponnefus; they purposed in his absence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themselves in his Countrey; as had beene their manner upon the like advantages. This made the King to dismisse the Achean Embassadours, (whom he should have accompanied home with his Armie) and to bid them have patience untill another yeere. So hee tooke his way homewards: and as hee was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there repaired unto him Demetrius Pharius, with no more than one Ship; that was newly chased out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetring had lately shewed himselfe a friend to Antigonus Doson in the warres of Cleomenes: and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was readie, at their first request, to take part with Philips Captaines. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome unto the Macedonian King: whose Counsailor he was ever after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings returne, brake up their Army; and gave over for the present their invasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that Summer following the King rested at Lariffa in Thessale, whilest his people gathered in their Harvest. But the Exclians rested not. They avenged themselves upon the Epirots : whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Eiolia, they required to with all extremities of warre, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the most famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, & all thought of war, untill another yeer, was laid afide: Philip fole a journey into Peliponnefu, with five thousand Foot, & about foure hundred Horfe. As foon as he was within Corinth; He commanded the gates to be that, that no word should be carried foorth of his arrivall. He fent privily for old Ararm to come thither unto him: with whom he tooke order, when, and in what places, he would have the Achaan Souldiers ready to meete him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrie, with formwhat more than two thousand Foot & an hundred horse; little thinking to meete with fuch opposition. Indeed they had little cause to seare: since the Achains themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Ma- 20 redonians; untill they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Evolians, and their sellowes, were by him furprifed, and all made prisoners for flaine. By this exploit which he did at his first comming, Philip got very much reputation, and likewise he purchased both reputation and love, by divers actions immediately following. He won P forbis, an exceeding frong Towne, in the borders of Arradia, which the Eleans and Arollians then held. He won it by affault at his first comming: wherein it much availed him, that the Enemie, not belowing that he would undertake fuch a peece of worke at fuch an unseasonable time of the yeer, was carelesse of providing even such store of weapons, as might have served to defend it. The Towne was preserved by the King from sacke; and given to the Achiens, of his own meere motion, before they requested it. Thence went 30 he to Laffon, which yeelded for very feare; hearing how eafily he had taken Pfophis. This Towns also he gave to the Achievas. The like liberality he used towards others, that had ancient title unto places by him recovered. Then fell he upon the Country of Elis, where was much wealth to bee gotten: for that the people were addicted to husbandrie, and lived abroad in Villages; even such as were of the wealthier fort among them. So he came to the Citic of Olympia: where having done facrifice to Jupiter, feasted his Captaines, and refreshed his Army three dayes, He proceeded on to the spoile of those, that had taken pleasure to share with the Etolians, in the spoiles of their otherwise-deferving neighbours. Great abundance of Cattell he tooke, with great numbers of flaves, and much wealth of all forts, fuch as could be found in rich villages. Then fell he in hand with 40 the Townes, whereinto a great multitude of the Countrie-people were fled. Some of these were taken at the first affault. Some yeelded for seare. Some prevented the labour of his journey, by sending Embaffadours to yeeld before he came. And some that were held with Garrifons against their wills, tooke courage to fet themselves at liberty, by feeing the King so neere: to whose Patronage thenceforth they betooke themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Erolian Captains ; because they distrusted their ability to hold them. So the King won more Towns in the Country, than the sharpneffe of winter would fuffer him to flay three dayes. Faine he would have fought with the Erolians: but they made fuch hafte from him, that he could not overtake them, till they had covered themselves within the Towne of Samteum; where they thought to 50 have beene fafe. But Philip affaulted them therein to forcibly, that he made them glad to yeeld the place; obtaining licence to depart, with their lives and armes. Having performed fo much in this expedition, the King repoled himselfe awhile in Megalopolu; and then removed to Argos, where he spentall the rest of the Winter.

Before the Kings arrivall in Pelopomes, the Luced emonions, with Lycurgin their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcatia; & threatned to do great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamity that fell upon the Eleans, of the danger hanging over their owne heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselves home.

This Lyeurgus, as he had no other righero the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which he could buy with money ! fo was he neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him; nor from those jealousies, with which Usurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall blood, that thinking himselfe to have best right unto the Kingdome, purposed to make way thereunto by massacre of his opposites; & afterwards to confirme himselfe, by propounding unto the multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equal distribution of all the lands among the whole mumber of the Citizens, according to the ancient inflitution of that Commonwealth. He won to his partie fome two hundred men; with whom he fell upon the Ephoris as they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Lyourg'm his house: 10 who perceiving the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should give account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds being not hereto predifpoled; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as even whileft he was using his best perswalions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. chilon perceived whereabout they went, and shifted presently away. So he lived afterwardsamong the Achains a banifled man, & hated of his own people. As for Lycurgan, he returned home: & suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found meanes to drive out his fellow-King young Agesipolis; whereby he made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to be suspected, in such fort, as once he should have beene appreliended by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might have beene defended ; yet rather than to adventure himselfe into judgement, hee chose to file for a time, and sojourne among his friends the Etolians. His wel-knowne vehemencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured unto him fuch good liking among the people, that in his absence they beganne to confider the weakeneffe of their owne furmifes against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, He took better heede unto himselfe: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was fo acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not be in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they lifted. By what actions he got the name of a Tyrant of at what time it was, that he chased Agesipolis out of the City; I do not certainly finde. Like 30 enough it is, That his being the first of three usurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to be placed in the ranke of Tyrants; which the last of the three very iustly deserved. Whatsoever he was toward some private Citizens: in the warre against Philip, He behaved himselfe as a provident man, and carefull of his Countries good.

§. II.

How Phillip was misadvised by ill Counsailors: who asterwards wrought treason agains hims and were justly panished. He invadeth the Etolians a second time: and forceth them to sue for peace: which is granted unto them.

Hilft the King lay at Argos devising upon his businesse for the veer following, fome ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently for their own greatheffe, as they were like to have spoiled all that he tooke in hand. Antigonas Doson had left unto Philip such Counsailors, as to him did seeme the fittelt men for governing of his youth. The chiefe of thefe was Apelles; that had the tharge of his person, & also the ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himself agreat Politician, thought that he should doe a notable peece of service to his Prince, if hee could reduce the Achaans unto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Ma-50 redonians lived. To bring this to paffe; during the late Expedition he had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Achaans our of their lodgings, and to strip them of the booty that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out, Hee was bold to chaffile some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whippe them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refraine) to help their fellowess them he laid by the heeles, and punished as Mutiners. Hereby he thought to bring it to paffe by little and little, that they mould be qualified with an habite of blind obedience; and thinke nothing unjust that pleased the King. But these Achieuns were renderly senfible in matters of liberty: whereof if they could have beene contended to fuffer any little diminution, they needed not have troubled the Macedonians to helpe them in the war against Cleomenes. They be mouned themselves unto old Araius; and besought him to thinke upon some good order, that they might not bee oppressed by degrees. Aran forthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weighty than at first it might seeme. The King bestowed gracious words upon those that had beene wronged, and forbade Apelles to follow the course begunne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he differabled his choler for a time. He thought fo well of his owne Project, that he could not endure to lay it afide; being perhaps unable to doe the King any valuable service, in businesse of other nature. He purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head; fince, in biting at the taile, the fifth had shot away from his. To mouth. It could not otherwise be than that among the Acheans there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Arasm. These he enquired out, and sending for them, entertained them with words of Court; promifing to become their especiall friend, and commend them unto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselfe : letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Aratus, he must be faine to deale precisely with the Acheans, and as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to give countenance unto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Acheans, and all other Peloponnesians. be quickely brought to conforme themselves unto the duty of obedient Subjects. By fuch perswassions, he drew the King to be present at Agium, where the Achaans were 20 to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would have bin needfull in a businesse of more importance, the King by faire words and threatnings together, obtained fo much, That Eperatus, avery infufficient man, but one of Apelles his new favourites, was chosen Prætor, in stead of one more worthy, for whom Araum had laboured. This was thought a good introduction unto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patras and Dyma, to a very strong Cafile held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The garrifon yeelded it up for feare, at his first comming: whereof he was glad, for that he had an earnest defire to bestow it upon the Dymaans, as he presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no messengers from the 20 Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrey the last Winter, he had let loose one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his prisoner; because he found him an intelligent man, and one that undertooke to make them for fake their alliance with the Liolians, and joyne with him upon reasonable termes. This if they could be contented to doe, he willed Amphidamus to let them understand, That he would render unto them freely all prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forreine invation; & that they should hold their liberty entire, living after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept under by any garrison. These conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might have done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new invasion upon 40 their Countrey: then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before over-haftie to beleeve fuch faire promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitour, and one that was set on worke for no other end, than to breede a mutuall diffidence betweene them and the A10lians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands upon him, and send him prisoner into Ætolia. But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himselfe; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was faid) marvailing what should be the cause, that hee heard no newes from the Eleans, concerning the offers which hee had made unto them by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Counsailor thereby tooke occasion to Supplant Aratus. He said that old Aratus, and his sonne together, had such devices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good: And long of them he faid it was, that the 50 Eleans did thus hold out. For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati, (the father and the fon) had taken him aside and given him to understand, that it would be very prejudiciall to all Peloponness, if the Eleans once became at the devotion of the Macedonian: And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very carefull in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a false lye, devised by Apelles himselfe, upon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no sooner heard this tale, but in a great rage he sent for the two Arati, and bade Apelles rehearse it over againe to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, ralking to them as to men already convicted. And when he had faid all the reft, ere either Philip or they spake any word; He added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you fuch ungratefull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achaans; & therein having made it known what ye are, to depart into Macedon, and leave you to your felves. Old Arasus gravely admonished the King; That whenfoever he heard any accufation, especially against a friend of his owne, or a man of worth, He should forbeare a while to give credit, untill hee had diligently examined the bufineffe. For fuch deliberation was Kingly, and he should never thereof repent him. At the present he said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talke with Amphidamus, and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles . For o it would be a very abfurd thing. That the King should make himselfe the Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other evidence, than one mans yea, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well; and faid that he would make fufficient inquirie. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilest Apelles delaied to bring in the proofe, which indeed he wanted, Amphidamus came from Elis, and rold what had befalne him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracie of the Arate: which when he found no better than a meere device against his honourable friends: He entertained them in loving maner as before. As for his love to Apelles, though it was hereby formewhat cooled; yet by meanes of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The unrestfull temper of Apelles, having with much vehemencie brought nothing to paffe; beganne (as commonly Ambition ufeth) to fwell and grow venemous for want of his free motion. He betakes himselfe to his cunning againe: and as before, being checket in his doings with those of the vulgar, he had prepared a snare for the Arais: so fayling of them; he thinkes it wisedome to lay for the King himself, and for all at once which were about him. In fuch manner formetime, the Spider thought to have taken the Swallow which drave away Flies out of the chimnie; but was carried (net and all) into the Aire by the bird, that was too ftrong to be caught and held by the fubrile workemanship of a Cob-web. Of the foure that next unto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place 30 about Philip; Taurion, his Lievtenant in Peloponnessus, and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithfull men, and fuch as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leoniiis Captain of the Targettiers, and Megaleas chiefe of the Secretaries, were easily won to be at Apelles his disposition. This politician therefore studied how to remove the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his owne into their roomes. Against Alexander he went to worke the ordinary way, by calumniation and privie detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion he used more finenesse; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of war, and one, whom for his many vertues the King might ill spare from being alwayes in his presence. By such Art he thought to have removed him, as we fay, Out of Gods ble sing into a warme Sunne. In the meane feafon Arasus retired him felfe; and fought to avoide the dangerous friendship of the King by forbearing to meddle in affaires of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; He was a man of no dispatch; and one that hadno grace with the people. Wherefore a great deale of time was loft, whilst Philip wanted both the money and the Corne, wherewith he should have beene furnished by the Acheans. This made the King understand his owne errour; which he wisely fought to reforme betimes. He perswaded the Achaans to rejourne their Parliament from Agium, to Sycion, the Towne of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his fon, perswading them to forget what was past, and laying all the blame upon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keepea more diligent eye. So by the travell of thefe so worthy men. He eafily obtained what he would of the Acheans. Fifty talents they gave him out of hand; with great store of Corne: & further decreed, That fo long as he himfelfe in person followed the wars in Pelopomesus, he should receive tentalents amoneth. Being thus enabled, he began to provide shipping, that so he might invade the Arolians, Eleans, and Lucedemonians, that were maritime people, at his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things go forward so well without his helpes even by the ministery of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entred into conspiracie with Leonism and Megaleas: binding himselfe and them by Oath, to crosse and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing, they thought to bring it to passe, that very want of ability to doe any thing without them; should make him speake them faire, and be glad to submit himselfe to their directions. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whilst he was a child; and therefore these wise men perswaded themselves, that, by looking bigge upon him, and imputing unto him all that fell out ill through their own misgovernment of his affaires. they might rule him as a childe still. Apelles would needs goe to Chalcis, there to take order for the provisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two staid behinde with the King, to play their parts; all more mindfull of their wicked oath.

The fifth Booke of the first pars

His Fleet and Army being in a readinesse: Philip made countenance, as if he would have bent all his forces against the Eleans; to whose aid therfore the Liolians sent men, little fearing that the mischiese would have fallen, as soone after it did, upon themselves. But against the Eleans and those that came to helpe them, Philip thought it enough to leave the Achaans, with some part of his & their Mercenaries. He himselfe with the body of his Army putting to Sea, landed in the Ile of Cephallenia: whence the Etolians. dwelling over against it, used to furnish themselves of shipping, when they went to rove abroad. There he befieged the Towne of Palaa, that had beene very ferviceable to the Enemie against him and his Consederates; and might beevery usefull to him, if hee could get it. Whilest he lay before this Towne, there came unto him fifteene shippes 20 of watre from Scerdilaidas; and many good Souldiers, from the Epirois, Acarnanians, and Messenians. But the Towne was obstinate; and would not be terrefied with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts fave one, on which fide Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith he overthrew two hundred foot thereof. Leonism Captaine of the Targeniers, was appointed by the King to make the affault. But he, remembring his covenant with Apelles, did both wilfully forbeare to doe his best; and caused others to do the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many flaine, not of the worst Souldiers; but fuch as had gotten over the breach, and would have carried the Towne, if the Treason of their Captaine, and some by him corrupted, had not hindred the victory. The King was angry with this, but there was no remedie; and therefore 30. he thought upon breaking up the fiege. For it was easier unto the Townes-men to make up the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilest he stood thus perplexed and uncertaine what course to take: the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard upon him, each of them defirous to draw him into their owne Countrey. The Meffenians alledged, that Lycurgus was busie in wasting their Countrey : upon whom the King might come unawares in one day; the Exefian windes which then blew, serving fitly for his Navigation. Hereto also Leonizus perswaded; who considered that those windes, as they would eafily carry him thither, fo would they detaine him there perforce (blowing all the Dogge-dayes) and make him fpend the Summer to finall or no purpose. But Aratus gave better counsaile, and prevailed. He shewed how unfitting it were, to let the 40 Aetolians over-runne all Theffalie againe, and fome part of Macedon, whilest the King withdrew his Armie farre off to seeke small adventures. Rather, he said that the time now served well to carry the warre into Aetolia; since the Prætor was gone thence abroad on roving, with the one halfe of their strength. As for Lycurgus; he was not strong enough to doe much harme in Peloponnesw: and it might suffice, if the Achaens were appointed to make head against him. According to this advice, the King sets sayle for Actolia, and enters the Bay of Ambraira, which divided the Accolians from Acamania. The Acarnanians were glad to fee him on their borders; and joyned with him as many of them as could beare armes, to helpe in taking vengeance upon their bad neighbours. He marched up into the in-land Countrey and taking some places by the way, which he 50 filled with Garrisons to affure his Retrait; He passed onto Thermum, which was the Receptacke of the Aetolians, and funcit place of defence in all extremities. The Country round about was a great Fastnesse, environed with rockie Mountaines of very narrow, Reepe, and difficult afcent. There wid the Aerokans use to hold all their chiefe meetings, their Faires, their election of Magistrates, and their solemne Games. There also they used to bestow the most precious of their goods , as in a place of greatest security. This opinion of the naturall strength, had made them carelesse in looking unto it. When Philip therefore had overcome the bad way, there was nothing elfe to do than to take spoile: whereof whereof he found fuch plenty, that he thought the paines of his journey well recompenced. So he loaded his Armie: and confuming all that could not be carryed away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chiefe of all belonging unto the Etolians; in remembrance of their like courtefie, shewed upon the Temples of Dium and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour have beene forborne. But perhaps he thought, as Monsieur du Gourgues the French Captaine told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his returne from Thermum, the Atolians laid for him: which that they would doe, he beleeved before; and therefore was not taken unawares. Three thousand of them there were that 10 lying in ambush, fell upon his skirts: but he laid a Counter-ambush for them, of his Itbreans; who staying behind the rest, did set upon the backes of the Exolians, whilest they were builly charging in Rere the Armie that went before. So with flaughter of the enemy, he returned the same way that he came: and burning downe those places that he had raken before, as also wasting the Country round about him. He safely carried all that he had gotten aboard his fleet. Once the Atolians made countenance of fight, iffuing out of Stratus in great bravery. But they were beaten home fafter than they came, and followed to their very gates.

The joy of this victorious Expedition being every way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any finister accident; it pleased the King to make a great feast unto all his friends and Captaines. Thither were invited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megaleas. They came, because they could not choose but their heavie looks argued, what little pleasure they tooke in the Kings prosperity. It grieved them to think, that they should be able to give no better account unto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings businesse; fince Apelles himselfe, as will be shewed anon, had played his own part with a most mischievous dexteritie. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to reviling him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused a great uprore; many running in (ashappens in fuch cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had passed. Which made him fend for Leonius and his fellowes. But Leonius was gotten out of the way: Megaleas, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their disorder: and they, to give him froward answers: insomuch, as they said at length, That they would never give over, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischiefe as hedeserved. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leonius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heeles : and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands upon Megaleas, yea and to cast him into prison? Why, faid the King, it was even I. This refolute answer, which Leonius had not expected, made him depart both sad and angrie; seeing himselse out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedy the matter. Shortly after Megaless was called forth to his answer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hindrance of the Kings victory at Palea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no leffe touching Leomius, that stood by as a looker on, than Megaleas that was accused. In conciufion the prefumptions against him were fo strong, and his answers thereto so weake; that he, and Crinon one of his fellowes, were condemned in twenty Talents: Crinon being remanded back to prison; and Leonius becomming Baile for Megaleas. This was done upon the way home-wards, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip dispatched well a great deale of businesse this yeere. For as soone as hee was at Corinib, he tooke in hand an Expedition against the Lacedamonians. These and the Eleans had done what harme they could in Peloponnefus, whileft the King was absent: The Acheans had opposed them as well as they could; with ill successe, yet so, as they hindred them from doing such harme as else they would have done. But when Philip came, he over-ranthe Country about Lacedamonie was in a maner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well beleeve that he was returned out of Aerolia. He tooke not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waste in the fields: and having beaten the enemie in some skirmishes, carried backe with him to Corinth a rich booty of cattell, slaves, and other Countrie-spoile. At Corinth he found attending him, Embassadors from the Rhodians and Chians, that requested him to set Greece at quiet, by granting peace unto the Aetolians. They had gracious audience : and he willed them to deale first with the Aetolians, who if they would make the fame request, should not finde him unreasonable. The Etolians had sped ill that yeer: neither saw they any likely hopes for the yeeres following. The Army that they had sent forth to waste Thessay and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane season they had beene grievously afflicted, as before is any thing to effect. In the centre of their owne Countrey. All Greece and Macedon was shewed, by Philip in the centre of their owne Countrey. All Greece and Macedon was up in armes against them, and their weake Allies the Eleans and Lacedamonians. Neither was it certaine, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnessan friends should be able to hold out, since they were not strong enough to keepe the field, but had already suffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to seeke their owne peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the £10-10 lians readily entertained, this negotiation of Peace: and taking truce for thirty dayes with the King, deak with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to intreat his present the King, deak with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to intreat his present the King, deak with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to intreat his present at a Diet of their mation, that should be held at Rhium; whither if he would vouch safe to come, they promised that he should find them conformable to any good reason.

Whilest these things were in hand, Leonius and Megaleas thought to have terrefied the King, by raifing fedition against him in the Army. But this device forted to no good effect. The fouldiers were eafily and quickly incenfed against many of the Kings friends, who were faid to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right unto them. But their anger spent it selfe in a noise, and breaking open of doores, without further harme done. This was enough to informe 20 the King (who eafily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very falle. Yea the Souldiers themselves, repenting of their insolence, defired to have the Authors of the turnult fought out, and punished according to their deferts. The King made shew as if he had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leonius and Megaleas were afraid lest the matter would soone come out of it selfe to their extreme danger. Wherefore they sent unto Apelles, the Head and Architect of their treason; reque-Ring him speedily to repaire unto Corinth , where hee might stand betweene them and the Kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while beene wanting to the businesse, undertaken by him and his treacherous companions. Hee had taken upon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his owne hand and thereby was hee growne into fuch credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Theffalse addressed themfelves unto him, and received from him their dispatch in every businesse. Likewise the Greekes in all their flattering Decrees, tooke occasion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles, making flight mention (onely for fashions sake) of the King : who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogancie of this great man, in fetting himselfe out unto the people: but in managing the Kings affaires, hee made it his speciall care, that money, and all things needfull for the publike service, should bee wanting. Yea hee enforced the King, for very neede, to fell his owne Plate and houshold vessels: thinking to resolve these and all other difficulties, by onely faying, Sir, be ruled wholly by me, and all shall be as you would wish. Hereto if the King would give assent, then had this Politician obtained his hearts defire. Now taking his journey from Chalcis in the Isle of Eubæa, to the City of Corinh were Philip then lay: he was fetcht in with great pompe and royalty, by a great number of the Captaines and Souldiers; which Leonisus and Megaleas drew forth to meete him on the way. So entring the city with a goodly traine, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride, and had vehement suspicion of his falsehood. Wherefore one was sent to tell him, that he should wait a while, or come another time, for the King was not now at leifure to be spoken with. It was a pretty thing, that fuch a check as this made all his attendants for fake him, as a man in difgrace; in such fort, that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him save his owne Pages. After this, the King vouchfafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of privacie, he used him not at all. This taught Megaleas to looke to himselfe, and run away betimes. Hercupon the King sent forth Taurion his Lievtenant of Peloponnesu, with all the Targettiers, as it were to do some piece of service, but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leonizus in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers, to signifie what was befallen him: and they forthwith fent unto the King in his behalfe. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, he might not be called forth to triall before their returne: as for the debt of Megaleas, if that were all the matter, they faid they were ready to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the souldiers made Philip more hastie than else he would have beene, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megaleas were intercepted, which hee wrote unto the Etolians, vilifying the King with opprobrious words, and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was even ready to sinke under the burden of his owne poverty. By this the King understood more perfectly the shille to keepe him so poore. Wherefore he sent one to pursue Megaleas that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his sonne, and another that was inward with him, to prison; wherein all of them shortly ended their lives. Megaleas also, neither daring to stand to tryall, nor knowing whither to sly, was weary of his own life; and slew himselfe about the same time.

The Etolians, as they had begun this warre upon hope of accomplishing what they listed in the Nonage of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this young Prince, tempered with the cold advice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their overthrow; they grew very defirous to make an end of it. Nevertheleffe being a curbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold upon all advantages, when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megaleas, together with some indignation 20 thereupon conceived by some of the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing forry. For being in good hope throughly to tame this unquiet Nation; He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning and continuing the War should rest upon themselves. Wherfore he willed his Confederates to lay afide all thought of peace, and to prepare for War against the yeare following; wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian Souldiers, by yeelding to let them winter in their owne Countrey. In his returne homeward, he called into judgement one Prolomie, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and 30 suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leentius his imprisonment; yet now they think the man worthy to die that was but his adherent. So vain is the confidence, on which Rebels use to build, in their favour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip won fome bordering Townes; from which the Dardanians, Ætolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his Kingdome: when he had thus provided for fafety of his owne; the Atolians might well know what they were to expect. Burthere came againe Embassadors from the Rhodians and Chians, with others from Ptolomy King of Egypt, and from the Citic of By-Zantium, recontinuing the former folicitation about the Peace. This fashion had been taken up in matters of Greece, ever fince the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had takenupon them to fet the whole Country at liberty: No fooner was any Province or Citie in danger to bee oppressed and subdued by force of warre, but presently there were found interceffors, who pitying the effusion of Greekish bloud, would importune the stronger to relinquish his advantage. By doing such friendly offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad fought to binde unto them those people, that were how soever weake in numbers, yet very good fouldiers. But hereby it came to passe, that the more froward fort, especially the Atolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to falsehood and robbery; durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their Neighbours: being well affured that if they had the worst, The love of Greece would be sufficient for to redeemetheir quiet. They had, fince the late Treaty of peace, done what harme they could in Peloponnesus : but being beaten by the Acheans, and standing inseare to be more foundly beaten at home, they defired now, more earnestly than before, to make an end of the Warre as soone as they might. Philip made such answer unto the Embassadours, as he had done the former yeare; That he gave not occasion to the beginning of this Warre, nor was at the present affraid to continue it, or unwilling to end it: But that the Etolians, if they had a defire to live in rest, must first be dealt withall, to signifie plainly their determination, whereto himselfe would returne such answer as he should think fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking unto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the War. But it happened in the middest of this Negotiation, that he was advertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victory Hamibal had obtained against the Romans in the battell at Thraspmene. These letters he communicated unto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part ters he communicated unto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part ters he communicated unto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hamibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian War. Hereby he with Hamibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian was concluded grew more inclinable than before unto Peace with the Letolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naupattus. There did Agelaus an Etalian make a great Oration: should finishing War betweene themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. To about finishing War betweene themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. To about finishing War betweene themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. To about finishing War betweene themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. To about finishing War betweene themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. To about finishing War betweene themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. To about finishing the country should forthwith look East ward, and seek by all means to set to be doubted, that they would forthwith look East ward, and seek by all means to set to be doubted, that they would forthwith look East ward, and seek by all means to set to be doubted, that they would forthwith look East ward, and seek by all means to set to be doubted, that they would forthwith look East ward, and seek by all means to set the search ward, and seek by all means to set the search ward, and seek by all means to set the search ward, and seek by all means to set the search war

Such advice could the Esolians then give, when they stood infeare of danger threatning them at hand: but being soone after weary of rest, as being accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so farre from observing and following their owngood counsell, that they invited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselves and the whole Country (but themselves before any other part of the Country) under servitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That every one should keepe what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages

5. III.

Philip at the perswasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League between Hannibal and Philip.

→ His being agreed upon: the Greekes betooke themselves to quiet courses of life; and Philip to prepare for the businesse of Italy, about which he consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battell of Canna: after which he joyned in league with Hannibal, as hath been shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice unto the Romans; and knew no other way to be avenged upon them, or to recover his owne loft kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsell, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise been farre more expedient for Poilip, to have supported the weaker of those two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, he should perhaps have brought them to peaceupon some equal termes, and thereby, as did Hiero, a farre weaker Prince, 40 have both secured his owne Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chiefe place in his friendship. The iffue of the counsell which he followed, will appeare soone after this. His first quarrell with the Romans ; the trouble which they and the Atolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, upon fuch Conditions that might eafily be broken: have been related in another place, as belonging unto the second Punick War. Wherefore I will only here set down the tenour of the League between Him and Carthage: which may seeme not unworthy to be read, if only inregard of the forme it selfethenused; though it had been over-long to have been inferted into a more busic peece.

The Oath and Covenants betweene Hannibal Generall of the Carthaginians, and Xenophanes, Embassador of Philip King of Macedon.

HIS is the League ratified by oath, which Hannibal the Generall, and with him Mago, Myrcal, and Barmocal, as also the Senators of Cartnage von a property and all the Carthaginians that are in his Army, have made with Xenophanes the son of Cleomachus Athenian, whom King Philip the son of Demerrius hath son of Cleomachus Athenian, whom King Philip the son of Demerrius hath fent unto us, for himselfe and the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before Jupiter, and Juno. and Apollo : before * The God of the Carthaginians, Hercules and Tolaus : before Mars, * Danon. Triton, Neptune: before The Gods accompanying Armes, the Sunne, the Moone, and the 20 Earth; before Rivers and Meddowes, and Waters; before all the Gods that have power over Carthage; before all the Gods that rule over Macedon, and the rest of Greece; before all the Gods that are Presidents of Warre, and present at the making of this League. Hannibal the Generall bath (aid, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians in his Army: Be it agreed betweene You and Us, that this Oath stand for friendship and loving affection, that We become friends, familiar, and brethren, upon Covenant, that the fafety of the Lords the Carthaginians, and of Hannibal the Generall, and those that are with him, and of the Rulers of Provinces of the Carthaginians, using the same Lawes, and of the Uticans, and as many Cities and Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiers and Affociates, and of all Townes and Nations with which we hold triend hip in Italy, Gaule, and Ligaria, and with whom we shall hold friendship or make alliance hereafter in this Region; be preserved by King Philip and the Macedonians, and such of the Greeks as are their Associates. In like maner shall King Philip and the Macedonians, and other the Greeks his Affociates, be faved and preserved by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Uticans, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Associates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria that are of our Alliance, or shall bereafter joyne with Us in Italy. Wee shall not take Counsell one against the other nor deale fraudulen: ly one with the other. With all readine se and good will without deceit or subtlety, We shall be enemies unto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, Townes, and Havens, withwhich Wee bave already league and friendship. We also shall be enemies to the enemies of King Philip. o excepting those Kings, Cities, & Nations, with which we have already league and friendship. The Warthat We have with the Romans, have Ye also with them, untill the Gods shall give us a new and happy end. Te shall and us with those things whereof we have need, and shall do according to the Covenants betweene Us. But if the Gods shall not give unto You and Ustheir helpe in this War against the Romans and their Associates then if the Romans offer friendship, We shall make friendship in such wise that Te shall be partakers of the same friendship, With Condition, That they shall not have power to make War upon you: Neither shall the Romans be Lords over the Corcyr & 211s, nor over those of Apollonia, nor Dyrrachium, nor over Pharus nor Dimalle nor the Parthini nor Atintania. They shall also render unto Demetrius Pharius all these that belong unto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But oif the Romans (after fuch peace made) shall make War upon Yee or Us . We will succour one another in that War, as either shall have need. The same shall be observed in War made by any other, excepting those Kings, Cities, and States, with whom we hold already league and friendhip. To this league if We or Te shall think fit to adde or detract, such addition or detraction shall be made by our common confent.

How Philip yeelded to his naturall vices, being therein soothed by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannize upon the free States his Associates: With the troubles into which hee thereby fell whilest he bore a part in the second Punick War. He poysoneth Aratus: and grows hatefull to the Acheans.

Ttherto Philip had carried himfelfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisedome, hee might have offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians, who had the better hand: yet this his medling in the Punick War, proceeded from a roy all greatnesse of minde, with a defire to secure and increase his owne estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countrie. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath been said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himfelfe to his defires: and thereby shortly governed him as he listed. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed fuch as they seemed. He was luftfull, bloudy, and tyrannicall: defirous of power to doe what he listed, and not otherwise listing to doe what he ought, than so farre forth, as by making a faire shew he might breed in men such good opinion of him, as should help to serve his turne in all that he took in hand. Before he should busie himselfe in Italy, herhought it requisite in good policie, to bring the Greekes that were his Associates, under a more absolute forme of subjection. Hereunto Apelles had advised him before: and he had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was aboysterous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deepely wronged if hee might not wholly have his owne way, but were driven to await the Kings opportunity at other times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to observe the kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man with the reines in his hand, those affections which himfelfedid onely feeme to follow. Therefore he grew daily more and more in credit: fo as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted Aratus: which the violence of Apelles

There arose about these times a very hot Faction among the Messenians, betweene 30 could never doe. the Nobility and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diverted (as happens often after a forreigne War) unto domesticall objects, than allayed and reduced unto a more quiet temper. In processe of no long time, the contention among them grew fo violent, that Philp was intreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: refolving fo to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strive any more about their Government: for that he would affume it wholly to himselfe. At his comming thither, he found Araius busie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne fecret purpole. Wherefore he consulted not with this reverend old man: but talked in private with fuch of the Meffenians as repaired unto him. He asked the Governours, what they meant to ftand thus disputing : and whether they had 40 not Lawes, to bridle the infolence of the unruly Rabble: Contrariwife, in talking with theheads of the popular Faction, He faid it was strange, that they being so many, would fuffer themselves to be opposed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus whilest each of them prefumed on the Kings affistance; they thought it best to goe roundly to worke, erethat hee were gone that should countenance their doings. The Governours therefore would have apprehended some seditious Orators, that were, they faid, the stirrers up of the multitude unto sedition. Upon this occasion, the people tooke Armes: and running upon the Nobility and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage, almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemes, that it would be casie to worry the Sheepe, when the Dogs their guardians were slaine. But 5 his falshood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbeare to tell him of it in publike, with very bitter and difgracefull words. The King was angry at this. But having already done more than was commendable, or excufable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein hee should need the help and countenance of his best friends; Hee was content to smother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as he could. Hee ledde old Aratus aside by the hand; and went up into the Castle of Ithome, that was over Messene. There he pretended to doe sacrifice : and sacrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keepe the place to his ownerse; for that it was of notable strength, and would serve to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadel of Corinth, which he had already, commanded the entrance into that Country. Whilest he was therefore facrificing, and had the entrals of the beast delivered into his hands, as was the manner; he shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he faw therein did fignifie, That being now in possession of this place, he should quietly goe out of it, or rather keep it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would have foothed him a little; were it only for defire to make amends for the angry words newly spoken by his son. But as Aratus stood doubtfull whatto answer, Demetrius Pharius gave this verdict: If thou be a footh fayer, thou no maist goe thy waies, and let flip this good advantage; if thou be a King, thou must not neglect the opportunity, but hold the Oxe by both his horns. Thus he spake ; resembling It home and Acrocorinthus unto the two horns of Peloponne (us. Yet would Philip needs heare the oninion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keep the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith unto the Meffenians: But if, by feizing upon Ithome, He must lose all the other Castles that he held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left unto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it far better to depart with his fouldiers, and keep men in duty, as he had done hitherto, by their own good wils, than by fortifying any firong places against them, to make them of his friends become his enemies.

To this good advice Philip yeelded at the present but not without some dislike thenceforth growing betweene him and the Arati; whom he thought more froward than beseemed them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man desirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be inward with him. For, as he plainly discovered his tyrannous purposes: so likewise he perceived, that in resorting to his house. He had been dishonest with his sons wise. He therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despight of Cleomenes, his owne Countri-man, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponness into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to beare him company. In this journey he found by experience what Aratus had lately told to him, That unhonest counsels are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirus were his sollowers and dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But he would needs have them so to remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious unto his Will, He seised upon their Towne of Oricum, and laid siege to Apollonia; having no good colour of these doings: but thinking himself strong enough to doe what he listed, and not seeing whence they should procure friends to helpe them. Thus in stead of setting the Country, as his intended Voyage into Italy required: He kindled a fire in it which he could never quench, untill it had laid hold on his own Palace. Whilesh he was thus labouring to bind the hands that should have fought for him in Italy gains thin, but procured the Atolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that Warre; the occurrents whereof we have related before, in the place whereto it belonged. In mannaging whereof, though Philip did the offices of a good Captaine: yet when leifure ferved, He made it apparent that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former defire, of oppressing the liberty of the Messenians, but made another journey into their Country, with hope to deceive them as before. They understood him better now than before; and therefore were not hasty to trust him too farre. When he saw that his cunning would not serve, He went to worke by force; and calling them his enemies, invaded them with open Warre. But in that Warre he could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Consederates were desirous to helpe him in such an enterprise. In this attempt upon Messene, he lost Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counfellor and Flatterer, not his Perverter; as appeares by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that he sped, the more angry he waxed against those that seemed not to savour his injurious doings. Wherefore by the ministery of Taurion, his Lievtenant, he poyfoned old Aratus; and shortly after that he poyfoned also the yonger Aratus: hoping that these things would never have been knowne, because they were done secretly, and the poysons themselves were more sure than manifest in operation. The Siegonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed unto

CHAP.4.5.5.

Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymnes, and Processions, to be celebrated every yeare twice, with a Priest ordained unto him for that purpose; as was accustomed unto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to be translated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are faid to have been encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo. which is like enough to have been true, fince the helpe of the Devill is never failing to the increase of Idolatry.

The fift Booke of the first part

The loving memory of Aratus their Patron, and fingular Benefactor, could not but worke in the Acheans a marvellous diflike of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He shall therefore heare of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counfell for themselves. At the present, the murder was not generally knowne or beleeved: neither were they in case to subsist, without his help that had committed it. The Ato. Is lians were a most outragious people, great darers, and shamelesse robbers. With these the Romans made a league: whereof the Conditions were foon divulged, especially that maine point, concerning the division of the purchase which they should make, namely, That the Atolians should have the Country and Townes; but the Romans the spovle. and carry away the people to fell for flaves. The Achains, who in times of greater quiet. could not endure to make streight alliance with the Atolians, as knowing their uncivil disposition; were much the more averse from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for fuch did the Greekes acount all other Nations except their owne) to make havock of the Country. The same consideration moved also the Lacedemonians to stand off a while, before they would declare themselves for the Atolians; 20 whose friendship they had embraced in the late War. The industry therefore of Philip, and the great care which he seemed to take of the Acheans his Confederates, sufficed to retaine them: especially, at such time, as their owne necessity was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged unto himselfe the Dymaans, by an inestimable benefit :recovering their Town, after it had bin taken by the Romans and Atolians; and redeeming their people wherefoever they might bee found, that had been carried away Captive, and fold abroad for flaves. Thus might he have blotted out the memory of offences past; if the malignity of his naturall condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and given men to understand, that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a 10 shew of goodnesse. Among other foule acts, whereof he was not ashamed; He took Polycratia the wife of the yonger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might serve to confirme in the people their opinion, that he was guilty of the old mans death. But of fuch faults he shall be told, when the Romans make War upon him the fecondtime: for, of that which happened in this their first Invasion, I hold it superstuous to make repetition.

6. V. Of Philopoemen Generall of the Acheans: and Machanidas, Tyrant of Lacedamon. Abst-40 tell between them, wherein Machanidas is flain.

Thappens often, that the decease of one eminent man discovers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there stood up Philopamen: whose notable va-Lour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the Acheans redoubtable among all the Greekes, and carelesse of such protection, as in former times they had needed against the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopamen: who being then a young man, and having no command; did especiall service to Antigenus at the battell of Sellafia against Cleomenes. Thence forward untill now he had spent the most part of his time in the Ile of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and feldome or never at peace betweene themselves; He bettered among them his knowledge, 50 and practice in the Art of Warre. At his returne home, He had charge of the Horse: wherein he carried himselfe so strictly, travelling with all the Cities of the Confederacie to have his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces: as also he so diligently trained them up in all exercise of service, that he made the Acheans very strong in that part of their forces. Being afterward chosen Prætor or Generall of the Nation, Hee had no lesse care to reforme their military discipline throughout, whereby his Countrie might be strong enough to defend it selfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend upon the helpe of others. Hee perswaded the Achaans to cut off their vaine expence of bravery, in apparell, houshold-stuffe, and curious fare, and to bestow that cost upon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to prove the better Souldiers, and futable in behaviour, unto the pride of their furniture. They had ferved hitherto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast afar off; that were usefull in skirmishing at some distance, or for surprises, or sudden and hastic Expeditions, whereto Aratus had bin most accustomed. But when they came to handie-strokes, they were good for nothing, so long as they were wholly driven to rely upon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopomen altered this: causing them to arme themselves more weightily, to use a larger kind of shield, with good swords, and strong , pikes, fit for service at hand. He taught them also to fight in close order, and altered the form of their embattelling: not making the Files fo deep as had bin accustomed, but extending the Front, that he mightuse the service of many hands.

Eight moneths were spent of that yeer, in which he first was Prator of the Achaans. when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedamon caused him to make trial, how his fouldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machanidas was the succetsor unto Lycurgus, a man more violent than his foregoer. He kept in pay a strong Army of mercenaries: and he kept them not onely to fight for Sparta, but to hold the Citie in obedience to himselfe perforce. Wherefore it behoved him not to take part with the Acheans, that were favorers of liberty; but to strengthenhimselfe by friendship of the Atolians: who, in making an Alliances, took no further notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their own profit. The people also of Lacedamon, through their inveterate hatred unto the Argives. Achains, and Macedonians; were in like fort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Atolian Faction. Very unwifely. For in feeking to take revenge upon those that had lately hindred them from getting the Lordship of Peloponneswithey hindred themselves thereby from recovering the Mastry of their own Citie. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his own fecurity, and no small hope of good that would follow, fuffered not Machanidas to be idle; but alwaies made him ready to fall upon his neighbours backes, and take of theirs what he could, whileft they were enforced, by greater necessity, to turne face another way. Thus had he often done, especially in the absence o of Philip: whose sudden comming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had usually made himfaile of his attempts. At the present he was stronger in men, than were the Acheans, and thought his owne men better Souldiers than were

Whilest Philip therefore was busied else-where, he entred the Country of the Manuneans: being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done beforehim; yea and perhaps to get the *Lord [hip of Peloponne fus, as having stronger friends and weaker oppo- *Excerpt. d Pol. sition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopamen was ready to entertain him at Maniz-Plut in vita Phil nea; where was fought between them a great battell. The Tyrant had brought into lopamen. the field upon Carts a great many of engines, wherewith to beat upon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in diforder. To prevent this danger, Philopæmen fent forth his light armature a good way before him; fo as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To fecond thefe, from the one and the other fide came in continual supply still at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Achaans and of Machanidas, were drawn up to the fight: being so farre advanced, each before their owne Phalanx, that it could no otherwise be different which preffed forward, or which recoyled, than by rifing of the duft. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made unferviceable, by the interpolition of his own men; in such manner as the Cannon is hindred from doing execution, in most of the battels fought in these our times. The Mercenaries of the Tyrant prevailed at length: not onely by their advantage of number, but (as Polybins well observeth) by surmounting their polybins opposites in degree of courage; wherein usually the hired Souldiers of Tyrants exceed those that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant than they which live oppressed by Tyrannie, since the one, by doing their best in fight, have hope to acquire somewhat beneficiall to themselves, whereas the other doe fight (as it were) to affure their owne servitude: so the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruits of his prosperity, have as good cause to maintaine his quarrell as their own; whereas they that ferve under a free State, have no other motive to doe manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the victory many companies (if not all) of forrein Auxiliaries are presently cast;

Philip having peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus Cappadocia, Ponius, Paphlagonia, Bishynia, and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

Y this victorie the Acheans learned to thinke well of themselves. Neither needed they indeed after a while (fuch was their discipline and continual exercise) to account themselves in matter of war inseriour to any, that should have brought against them no great oddes of number. As for the Macedonian, he made no great 50 use of them. But when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Etolians, he studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; fince the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He tooke in hand many matters together, or very nearely together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Acheans would have done him fervice, they must, by helping him to oppresse others that never had wronged him, have taught him the way how to deale with themselves. He greatly hated Attalu King of Pergamu, who had joyned with the Romans and Eiolians in warre against him. This

CHAP. 4. $.6. of the History of the World.

This Atalus, though a King, was fcarce yet a Nobleman, otherwife than as he was ennobled by his own, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune began in Phileterus his Uncle: who being guelded, by reason of a mishap which he had when he was a childe, grew afterwards thereby to be the more effectmed as great men in those times reposed much confidence in Eunuches, whose affections could not be obliged unto wives or children. He was entertained into the family of Docimus, a Captaine following Antigonus the first; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Master, that betooke himselfe to Lysimachus King of Thrace. Lysimachus hada good opinion of him; and put him in trust with his money and accounts. But when at length he stood in seare of this King, that 10 grew a bloudy Tyrant; he fled into Asia, where he seized upon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lysimachus. The Towne and money, together with his owne service, he offered unto Seleuchus the first, that then was ready to give Lysimachus battell. His offer was kindly accepted, but never performed; for that Seleuchus, having flaine Lysimachus, dyed shortly after himselse, before he made use of Phileterus or his mony . So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus, with the Country round about it; and reigned therein twenty years as an absolute King. He had two brethren: of which the elder is faid to have bin a poor Carter; and the younger perhaps nor much better, before such time they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetærus left his Kindome to the elder of these, or to the son of the elder, called Eumenes. This Eumeones enlarged his Kingdome; making his advantage of the diffention between Seleuchus Calinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the fons of the second Antiochus. He fought a battell with Hierax, neere unto Sardes, and won the victory. At which time, to animate his men against the Gaules that served under his Enemy, he used a pretty device. He wrote the word * Victory upon the hand of his Soothfayer, in fuch colours as would eafily come off: * Jul Front. and when the hot liver of the beast that was facrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the Strails of the letters, He published this unto his Army as a Miracle; plainly foreshewing that the gods would be affiftant in that Battell.

After this Victory, he grew a dreadfull enemy to Seleuchus: who never durst attempt to recover from him, by Warre, the Territory that he had gotten and held. Finally, o when he had reigned two and twenty yeeres, he died by a furfeit of over-much drinke, and left his kingdome to Attalus, of whom we now entreat, that was fon unto Attalus the youngest brother of Philetarus. Attalus was an undertaking Prince, very bountifull. and no leffe valiant. By his owne proper forces he restored his friend Ariara: hes the Cappadocian into his Kingdome, whence he had been expelled. He was grievously molefted by Achaus: who letting up himselfe as king against Antiochus the great, reigned in the leffer Asia. He was besieged in his own City of Pergamus: but by the helpe of the Tellofage, a Nation of the Gaules, whom he called over out of Thrace, He recovered all that he had lost. When these Gaules had once gotten footing in Asia, they never wanted employment but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quar-40 ters, or interposed themselves, without invitation; and sound themselves worke in quarrels of their owne making. They caused Prusias King of Buhyma to cease from his war against Byzantium. Whereunto when he had condescended; they neverthelesse within a while after invaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained against them a great victory; and used it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor sexe. But the swarme of them increafing, they occupied the Region about Hellespont: where, in seating themselves, they were much beholding unto Arralus. Nevertheleffe, presuming afterwards upon their strength, they forced their Neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute: in the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect unto Attalus, than to any that had worse deserved of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themselves within the bounds of that Province, which tooke name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppresse the weakest of their neighbours; and to fill up the Armies of those, that could best hire them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posterity of such as had saved themselves and their Provinces, in the flothfull reigne of the Persians; or in the busic times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were very ancient. For the first of their line had married with Atoffa, fifter unto the great King Cyrus. Their Countrey was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is shewed before. But the fon of that king, whom Perdiccas crucified, espying his time while the Macedonians were at civill warresamong themselves; recovered his dominion, and passed it over to his off-spring. The Kings of Poneus had also their beginning from the Persian Empire; and are said to have issued from the royall house of Achamenes. The Paphlagonians derived themselves from Pylamenes, a King that assisted Priamus at the warre of Troy. These, applying themselves unto the times, were alwayes conformable unto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prusias had begun to reigne in Bythinia, some few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay fomewhat out of the Macedonians way : by whom therefore, having other employment, they were the leffe molested. Calantus, one of Alexanders Captains, made an expedition into their Country; where he was vanquished. They had afterwards to doe with 10 a Lievtenant of Antigonu, that made them somewhat more bumble. And thus they shuffled, as did the rest, untill the reigne of Prusias, whom we have already sometimes mentioned.

6. VII.

The Town of Cios taken by Philip, at the instance of Prusias, King of Bythinia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and the like actions, Philip growes hat efull to many of the Greeks: and is marred upon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

Rusias, as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Analus; whose greatnesse 20 he suspected. He therefore strengthened himselfe, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrary fide, entred into a strict Confederacie with the Liolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greekes. But when Philip had ended his Atolian warre, and was devising with Anizochus about sharing betweene them two the Kingdome of Egypt, wherein Prolomie Philopater, a friend unto them both, was newly dead; and had left his son Prol. Epiphanes, a young childe, his heire: the Bythinian entreated this his Father-in-law to come over into Asia, there to winne the Towne of the Ciani, and bestow it upon him. Prustas had no right unto the Towne, nor just matter of quarrell against it : but it was fitly seated for him, and therewithall rich. Philip came, as 30 one that could not well deny to help his Son-in-law. But hereby he mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadours came to him whilest he lay at the fiege, from the Rhodians, and divers other States: intreating him to forfake the enterprise. He gave dilatorie, but otherwise gentle answers: making shew as if he would condescend to their request, when he intended nothing lesse. At length he got the Towne: where, even in presence of the Embassadours, of whose solicitation he had seemed so regardfull, Hee omitted no part of cruelty. Hereby he rendred himselfe odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruell Prince. Especially his fact was detested of the Rhodians, who had made vehement intercession for the poore Ciani: and were advertised by Embassadours of purpose sent unto them from Philip, That, how soever it were in his power to winne 40 the Towne as soone as he listed, yet in regard of his love to the Rhodians, he was contented to give it over. And by this his clemency, the Embassadours said, that he would manifest unto the world what slanderous tongues they were, which noysed abroad such reports, as went of his falshood and oppression. Whilest the Embassadours were declaming at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect; there came some that made a true relation of what had hapned: shewing that Philip had facked and destroyed the town of Cios, and, after a cruell flaughter of the Inhabitants, had made flaves of all that escaped the sword. If the Rhodians tooke this in great despite, no lesse were the Atolians inflamed against him : fince they had fent a Captain to take charge of the Towne; being warned before by his doings at Lysimachia and Chalcedon (which he had withdrawn from their Confederacie to his owne) what little trust was to be reposed in the faith of this King. But most of all others was Assalus moved with confideration of the Masedonians violent ambition, & of his own estate. He had much to lose; and was not without hope of getting much if he could make a strong Partie in Greece. He had already, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captains, in purchasing with much liberalitie the love of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpeters of other mens vertue, having lost their owne. On the friendship of the Linkans he had cause to presume; having bound them unto him by good offices, many and great, in their late warre with Philip. The Rhodians that were mighty at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Egyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, he eafily drew into a streight alliance with him, by their hatred newly conceived against Philip.

Upon confidence in these his friends, but most of all, in the ready affistance of the Rhodians, Analus prepared to deale with the Macedonian by open war. It had bin unfeafonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the enemy tended; fince his defire to fasten upon Asia was manifest, and his falshood no lesse manifest, than was such his defire. They met with him shortly not far from Chios, and fought with him a battell at Sea: wherin though Artalus was driven to run his own ship on ground, hardly escaping to land: to though the Admirall of the Rhodians took his deaths wound: and though Philip after the battel took harbor under a Promontory, by which they had fought, so that he had the gathering of the wracks upon the shoare: Yet for a smuch as he had suffered far greater losse of ships and men, than had the enemie; and fince he durst not in few dayes after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to brave him in his Port; the honour of the victory was adjudged to his Enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwards befieged and won some towns in Caria: whether only in a bravery, and to despight his opposites; or whether upon any hopeful defire of conquest, it is uncertain. The stratagem, by which he won Prinaffus, is worthy of noting. He attempted it by a Mine: & finding the earth fo flony, that it refifted his work; he neverthelesse commanded the Pioners to make a noise under ground; and secretly in the night time he raised great mounts about the entrance of the Mine, to breed an opinion in the befieged, that the work went marvelloufly forward. At length he fent word to the Townf-men, that by his undermining, two acres of their wall stood only upon woodden props, to which if he gave fire, and entred by a Breach, they should expect no mercy. The Prina sians little thought, that he had fetcht all his earth and rubbish by night a great way off, to raise up those heaps which they saw; but rather that all had bin extracted out of the Mine. Wherefore they suffered themselves to be out-faced, and gave up the Town as loft, which the Enemy had no hope to win by force . But Philip could not flay to fettle himself in those parts. Attalm and the Rhodians were too strong for him at sea, and compelled him to make hast back into Macedon; whither they followed him all the way in maner of pursuit.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian war, seek matter of quarrell against Philip. The Athenians upon flight cause proclaim war against Philip; moved thereto by Attalus; whom they flatter. Philip wins divers Towns; and makes peremptory answer to the Roman Embassadour. The furious resolution of the Abydeni.

Hefe Asiatique matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet served well to make anoyfe in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a defire of making warre in Macedon, at least with a conceit that it were expedient so to doe. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the state of those Eastern Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greeks, which lay betweene them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greekes were factious, and seldome or never at peace. As for the Macedonian; though length of time, and continuall dealings in Greece ever fince the reignes of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference betweene him and the Naturalls: yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because he was originally for sooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him upon ancient quarrels: and they that had beene most beholding unto him, were neverthelesse weary of him, by reason of his personall faults. All this gave hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detaine the Roman Armies: especially fince the divisions of the Country were such, that every petry Eflate was apt to take counsell apart for it selfe; without much regarding the generality. But the poore Commonalty of Rome had no great affection to fuch a chargeable enter-Prise. They were already quite exhausted, by that grievous war with Hannibal: wherein they had given by Loane to the Republike, all their money: neither had they as yet received, neither did they receive untill fifteene or fixteene yeers after this, their whole summe backe againe. That part of paymental so which was already made, being not in present mony, but much of it in Land: it behoved them to rest a while; and bestow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the leffe able to beftow cost. Wherefore they tooke no pleasure to heare, that Arralus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadours to solicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had fent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by fetting out the preparations of this dangerous enemy, that folicited not onely the Townes upon the Continent, but all the Ilands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadours, as one that meant shortly to hold warre with the Romans upon their owne ground. Philip had indeed no fuch intent: neither was he much too strong, either of himself, or by his alliance in Greece, to be refisted by Attalus and the Rhodians; especially with the help of the Etolians their 10 good friends, and (in a manner) his owne professed enemies. But such things must be published abroad, if onely to predispose men unto the warre, and give it the more honest

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermedling in the affaires of those that were more mighty than himselfe. He was too unskilfull, or otherwise too unapt, to retaine his old friends: yet would he needs be seeking new enemies. And he found them such, as he deserved to have them: for he offered his helpe to their destruction, when they were in misery, and had done him no harme. It behoved him therefore, either to have strained his forces to the utmost in making warre upon them; or in defifting from that injurious course, to have made amends for the wrongs 26 past, by doing friendly offices of his owne accord. But He, having broken that League of peace, which is of all other the most naturall, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, unlesse they thinke themselves justly provoked; was afterwards too fondly perfwaded, that he might well be secure of the Romans, because of the written Covenants of peace betweene him and them. There is not any forme of oath, whereby fuch Articles of peace can be held inviolable, fave onely * by the water of Styx, that is, by Necessia: which whilest it binds one partie, or both unto performance, making it apparent, that he shall be a loser who starts from the Conditions; it may so long (and so long onely) be presumed, that there shall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans never hearkened after Philip: for necessity made them let him alone. But when once they 20 had peace with Carthage, then was the river of Styx dryed up: and then could they swear *Plant, Amphitr. as * Mercurie did in the Comedie, by their own selves, even by their good swords, that they had good reason to make war upon him. The voyage of Sopater into Africk, and the present war against Attalus, were matter of quarrell as much as needed: or if this were not enough; the Athenians helped to furnish them with more. The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their own barren Territory, tooke state upon them neverthelesse, as in their ancient fortune. Two young Gentlemen of Acarnania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were delivered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of idolatrous superstition, vainely said to be availeable unto felicitie after this life) discovered themselves by some impertinent 40 questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Hereupon they were brought before the Officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by meere errour, not thinking to have therein done amisse; yet, as it had beene for some haynous crime, they were put to death. All their Countri-men at home took this in ill part; and fought to revenge it as a publike injurie, by warreuponthe Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip some Macedonians to help them, they entred into Assica: who wasted it with fire and fword; and carried thence a great booty. This indignitie stirred up the high-minded Athenians; and made them thinke upon doing more, than they had ability to performe. All which at the present they could doe, was to send Embassadours to King Attalus; gratulating his happy successe against Philip, and intreating him to visit their Citie. Attalm 50 was hereto the more willing, because he understood that the Roman Embassadours, hovering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to be there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, befides his own followers, with fome of the Rhodians. Landing in the Pirau, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they rejoycing that he continued enemy to Philip; and he being no leffe glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the war. The Athenians came out of their Ci-

tie, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wives and children, in as solemne a pompe as they could devise, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the Romans that were with him, in very loving manner: but towards Analus himfelfe they omitted no point of observance, which their flattery could suggest. At his first comming into the City they called the people to Affembly: where thy defired him to honour them with his presence, and let them heare him speake. But he excused himselfes faving, That with an evill grace he should recount unto them those many benefits, by which he studied to make them know what love he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he should deliver in writting, what he would have to be propounded. Hedid fo. The points of his Declaration were; first, what he had willingly done for their fake: then, what had lately passed betweene him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation unto them, to declare themselves against the Macedonian, whilest he with the Rhodians. o and the Romans, were willing and ready to take their part: which if they now refused to doe, he protested, that afterwards it would be vaine to crave his helpe. There needed little intreatie: for they were as willing to proclaime the warre, as he to defire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours : and obtained, That unto the ten Tribes, whereof the body of their Citizens confifted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if he were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they also decreed a Crowne of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodrans free Citizens of Athens.

Thus began a great noise of warre, wherein little was left unto the Romans for their part; Attalus and the Rhodians taking all upon them. But while these were vainely misspending the time, in seeking to draw the Etolians to their partie: that contrary to their old maner were glad to be at quiet: Philip wonne the Townes of Maronea and Amus with many other strong places about the Hellespont. Likewife passing over the Hellespont, he laid siege unto Abydus; and wonne it, though he was faine to stay there long. The towne held out, rather upon an obstinate resolution, and hope of succour from Aitalus and the Rhodians, than any great ability to defend it felfe against fo mighty an enemy. But the Rhodians fent thither only one Quadrireme Gallie: and Arralus no more than three hundred men, farre too weake an aide to make good the place. The Roman Embassadours wondred much at this great negligence of them that had taken so much

These Embassadours C. Claudius, M. Amylius, and P. Sempronius, were ferr unto Prolomy Epiphanes King of Egypt, to acquaint him with their victory against Hannibas and the Carihaginians ; as alfo to thank him for his favour unto them shewed in that wars and to defire the continuance thereof, if they should need it against Philip. This Egyptean King was now in the third or fourth yeere of his Reigne, which (as his Father Philopater had done before him) he beganne a very young boy. The courteffe for which the Romans were to thanke him, was, that out of Egipt they had lately beene supplied with Corne, in a time of Extreme Dearth; when the miseries of War had made all their own Provinces unable to relieve them. This meffage could not but bee welcome to the 40 Egyptian: fince it was well knowne, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselves against him, conspiring to take away his Kingdome. And therefore it might in reason be hoped, that he, or his Councell for him, should offer to supply the Remans with Corne: fince this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Estate no lesse than theirs:

But as the errand was for the most part complementall: so had the Embassadors both leifure and direction from the Senate, to looke unto the things of Greece by the way: Wherefore they agreed, that M. Amplius the yongest of them should steppe aside and visit Philip, to try if he could make him leave the siege of Abydus; which else he was like to carry. Emylins, comming to Philip, tels him, that his doings are contrary to the League that he had made with the Romans. For Arralm and the Rhodians, upon whom to he made warre, were Confederate with Rome t and the towns of Abram, which he was now befreging, had a kind of dependancie upon Arralus. Hereto Philip answered. That An alm and the Rhodians had made warre upon him and that he did onely require them With the like. Doe you alfo (faid & mylius) require thefe poore Abydent with fach tograble Warre, for any the lake Invalion by them first made upon you! The King was angry to heare himfelfe thus taken thore and therefore he roundly made answer to Emplius; It is your Jouth, Sir, and your beauty, and Cabove all.) your being a Roman, that makes you think Prefumpsuous. But I would wish yes to remember the League that we have made with me and to keepe it I If ye doe otherwise. I will make ye inderstand, that the Kingdome, and Name of Mmmmm

Macedon is in master of warre, no less enable than the Roman. So he dismissed the Embassador; and had the Towne immediately yeelded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to have died every one of them, and set their Towne on fire; binding themselves hereto by a fearefull oath, when Philip denied to accept them upon reasonable conditions. But having in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Governours and Ancients of the City to change this resolution; and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silver to Philip: about which whilst they were busse, the memory of their oath wrought so effectually in the yonger fort; that, by exhortation of the Priests, they sell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Hereof the King had so little compassion, that He said, he would grant the Abydeni three daies leisure to die: and to that end forbad his men to enter the towne; or hazzard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad sooles.

The Romans decree warre against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in desence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poore the Athenians were at this time both in quality and estate.

His calamity of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romans unto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it neerely resembled; though Rome was not alike interessed in the quarrell. But to helpe themselves with pretence for the warre, they had found out another Saguntum, even the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian should winne, then rested there no more to doe, than that hee should presently embarke himselfe for Italy, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in five moneths, but in the short space of five dayes sayling. Thus P. Sulpitius the Consul told the multitude, when he exhorted them to make warre upon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alledged; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater Kingdome, might dare to undertake: as also the fortunate voyage of Scipio into Africk; to thew the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Country. By fuch arguments was the Commonalty of Rome induced to believe, that this war with the Macedonian was both just and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediatly the same Consull hasted away towards Macedon, having that Province allotted unto him before, and all things in a readineffe, by order from the Senate; who followed other Morives than the people must be acquainted with. Great thankes were given to the Athenian Embassadors, of their constancie (as was said) in not changing their faith at such times as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thankes were due to them, though not upon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to thinke it a benefit unto themselves; that any Greeke Towne, refusing to sue unto the Macedonian for peace, requested their helpe against him. But the Senate; intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Easterne parts, had reason to gives thankes unto those, that ministred the occasion. Since therefore it was an untrue suggestion, That Philip was making readie for Italy: and since neither Attalus, the Rhodians, nor any other State in those quarters, defired the Romans to give them protection: these busic-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and confequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) fent Embassadors into all parts of the World, even to Psolomy of Egypt, and to the Romans as well as to Analm and others their neighbours; must be accepted as cause of the warre, 50 and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Neverthelesses it loves to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Sulpitius the Consul were such, as might have argued Athens to be the least part of his care. He failed not about Peloponnesses, but tooke the ready way to Macedon, and landing about the River of Assume the Dytrachium and Apollonia, there began the Waire. Soone upon his comming, the Athenian Embassadours were with him, and craved his helpe: whereof they could make no benefit whilest he was far from them. They bemoaned themselves as men besieged, and intreated him to deliver them.

them. For which cause he sent unto them C. Claudius with twenty gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces he retained with him, for the prosecution of a greater designe. The Athenians were not indeed besieged: onely some Rovers from Chalcie, in the Ile of Ender, and some bands of adventurers out of Corinto, used to take their shippes, and spoile their fields, because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of these two townes. The robberies done by these Pyrats & Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than war-like Athenians, in this declaring Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arrival of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily preserved them. As for the quests of Egypt, Cyprus, and Cicil; to make warre upon the great Persian King, and to hold so much of Greece in subjection, as made them redoubtable unto all the rest; had now no more than three ships, and those open ones, not much better than long boates. Yet thought they not themselves a whit the worse men, but stood as highly upon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had beene still their owne.

The Town of Chalcis in Eab & a saken and fact by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athons. Philip attempteth to take Athons by surprize: wasteth the Country about, and makes a journey into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, and his wife. Philip offers to make warre against Nabis for the Acheans. He returneth home through Attica, which he spoileth agains: and provides against the Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Divers Princes joyne with them. Great labouring to drawthe Etolians into the warre.

Hilip returning home from Abydus, heard newes of the Roman Conful his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to give him entertainment, or perhaps before he had well resolved, whether it were best a while to sit still, and trie what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Invaders with all his forces: he received advertisement from Chaleis of a grievous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius With his Romans, finding no fuch worke at Athens as they had expected, or was answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to doe somewhat that might quicken the warre, and make his owne imployment better. He grew soone weary of sitting as a Scarre-crow, to save the Athenians grounds from spoile; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a businesse of more importance. The towne of Chalcia was very negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemy at hand: and more negligently by the Townef-men, who reposed themselves upon their Garrison. Hereof Claudius having advertisement, failed thither by night, for feare of being descried: and arriving therea little before breake of day, tooke it by Scalado. He used no mercy, but flew all that came in his way : and wanting men to keepe it, (unleffe he should have left the heartlesse Athemans to their owne defence) He fet it on fire; confuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all provisions for Warre, which were plenteously filled. Neither were He & his Affociates contented with the great abundance of spoile which they carried aboard their ships, and with inlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most security, kept there imprisoned: but, to shew their despight and hatred unto the King, they overthrew and brake in pieces the Statuaes to him there erected. This done, they hasted away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit was like to be joyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias about sometwenty miles thence, whither when these tidings or part of them, were brought him, though hee faw that it was too late to remedie the matter; yet he made all haste to take revenge. He thought to have taken the Athemans. with their trusty friends, busie at work in ransacking the town, & loading themselves with spoile: but they were gone before his comming. Five thousand light-armed foot he had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leaving at Chales onely a few to bury the dead, He marched from thence away speedily toward Aibens ! thinking it not unpossible to take his enemies, in the joy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcie. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-post that stood Scout for the City upon the borders, had not descried him a farre off, and swiftly carried word Mmmmm 2

of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither: who found all the Towne afleepe, as fearclesse of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a trumpet out of their Citadell to sound the Alarme, and with all speede made ready for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there: who feeing the many lights, and other fignes of busie preparation usuall in such a case, understood that they had newes of his comming; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucity of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compasse about by sea, and had no cause of haste) yet having in the town some mercenarie Souldiers, which they kept, of their owne, besides the great multitude of citizens; they adventured to iffue forth at a gate, whereto they faw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this; reckoning all those his owne, that were thus hardy. He therefore only willed his men to follow his example; & prefently gave charge upon them. In that fight he gave fingular proofe of his valour: and beating downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, drave them with great flaughter backe into the City. The heat of his courage transported him further than discretion would have allowed, even to the very gate. But he retired without harme taking; for that they which were upon the Towers over the gate, could not use their casting weapons against him, without much indangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the City. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Grove, and many goodly 20 Monuments besides, neere adjoyning unto Athens: of which he spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, even unto the sepulchres of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Aegina; too late in regard of what was already past: but in good time to prevent him of satisfying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed from thence to Corinth, and hearing that the Acheans held a Parliament at Argos, He came thither to them un-

The Achaans were devising upon war: which they intended to make against Nabia the Tyrant of Lacedamon: who being started up in the room of Machanidas, did greater mischiese than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly upon his mercenaries : and of his subjects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor; a greedy extortioner upon those that lived under him; and one that in his naturall condition finelt rankly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apega was very fitly matched with him, fince his dexterity was no greater in spoiling the men, than hers in seccing their wives; whom the would never fuffer to be at quiet, till they had prefented her with all their jewels and apparell. Her husband was so delighted with her property, that he caused an Image to be made, lively representing her; & apparelled it with such costly garments as she used to weare. But it was indeed an Engine, serving to torment men. Hereof he made use, when he meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling unto him some rich man, of whose money he was desirous; he would bring him into the roome where this Counterfeit Arega stood, and there use all his art of perswasion, to get what he defired, as it were by good will. If he could not fo speed, but was answered with excuses; then tooke he the refractory denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apega (who sate by in a Chaire) could perswade more effectually. So he ledde him to the Image, that rose up and opened the armes, as it were for imbracement. Those armes were full of sharpe yronnayles, the like whereof was also sticking in the breasts, though hidden with her clothes: and herewith she griped the poore wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Government. In his dealings abroad hee combined with the Aetolians, as Machanidas and Lycurgs had done before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former warre. Of Philopamens vertue he ftood in feare; and therefore durst not provoke the Acheans, as long as they had fuch an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a farre worse Captaine, was their Prætor, and all, or the greatest part of their Mercenaries were discharged; Philopamen being also gone into Crete, to follow his beloved occupation of Warre: then did Nabis fall upon their Territory; and wasting all the fields, made them distrust their owne safety in the Townes.

Against this Tyrant the Acheans were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them; and had fet downe what proportion of Souldiers every City of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them not to trouble themselves with the care of this businesse; forasmuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden upon himselfe. With exceeding joy and thankes they accepted of this kinde offer. But then he told them, That, whilest he made warre upon Lacedamon, He ought not to leave his owne Townes unguarded. In which respect he thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Coranth, & some Companies into the He of Eubæa; that so he might fecurely purfue the warre against Nabis. Immediatly they found out his device: which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his warre against the Romans. Wherefore their Prætor Cycliadas made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was affembled. So passing the Decree, upon which they had agreed before, for preparing warre against Nabis, hee brake up the Affembly, with every mans good liking; whereas in former times, he had beene thought no better than one of the Kings Parafites. It grieved the King to have thus failed in his purpose with the Acheans. Neverthelefle he gathered up among them a few Voluntaries; and fo returned by Corinth backe into Attica. There he met with Philocles one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had beene doing what harme he might unto the Countrie. With this addition of 10 strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusine, the Haven of Pyreus, and even the City of Athens. But the Romans made fuch hafte after him by Sea, thrusting themselves into every of these places; that he could no more than wreake his anger upon those goodly Temples, with which the Land of Anica was at that time fingularly beautified. So he destroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty, of their owne; or, having long agoe beene masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choyce was found. Neither did he only pull all downe: but caused his men to breake the very stones, that they might be unserviceable to their reparation. His loffe at Chalcis being thus revenged upon Athens, He went home into Macedon: and there made provision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardanians, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infest him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Atolians : to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Naupastus, he sent an Embassage, requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpitius the Roman Conful encamped upon the River of Apfus. Thence he fent forth Apultius his Lievtenant, with part of the Army, to waste the borders of Macedon. Apustizus tooke sundry Castles and Townes; using such extremity of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Towne which he wonne by force, that none durst afterwards make refistance, unlesse they knew themselves able to hold our. Returning towards the Consul with his spoile, he was charged in Rere, upon the passage of a brooke, by Athenagoras a Macedonian Captain: but the Romans had the better, & killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more, to the increase of their booty, with which they arrived in fafety at their camp. The fuccesse of this Expedition, though it were not great. yet ferved to draw into the Roman friendship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the son of Scerdilaidas the Illyrian: Aminander King of the Athamanians, and Bato the sonne of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their affiftance unto the Conful, who thanked them: and faid, That he would shortly make use of Pleur atus and Baso, when he entred into Macedon: but that the friendship of Aminander, whose Country lay betweene the Ætolians and Theffaly, might be perhaps availeable with the Atolians, to stirre them up against Philip. So the present care was wholly set upon the Atolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadours from the Macedonian, Romans, & Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian spake first, and said: That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace betweene his mafter and the Arolians: so was it to be hoped, that they would not fuffer themselves, without good cause, to be carried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to confider, how the Romans hereto fore had made shew, as if their warre in Greece tended only to the defence of the Atolians, and yet notwithstanding had been angry that the Ætolians, by making peace with Philip, had no longer need of fuch their Patronage. What might it be that made them fo buffe, in obtruding their protection upon those that needed it not? Surely it was even the generall hatred, which these Barbarrans bore unto the Greeks. For even after the same fort had they lent their help to the Mamerines: and afterwards delivered Syracufe, when it was oppreffed by Caribaginian tyrants, but now both Syracuse and Messana, were subject unto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alleaged many examples, adding, That in like fort it would happen to the Atolians: who if they drew fuch mafters into Greece. must not looke hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to confult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and fend them fuch a Moderator, as went every yeere from Rome to Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded that it was best for them, whilest as yet they might, and whilest one of them as 10 yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, upon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three yeers agoe made the peace which still continued. although that the very fame Romans were then against it, who fought to breake it now. It would have troubled the Romans, to frame a good answer to these objections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth, in shewing whereunto this their Patronage, which they offered with fuch importunity, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were fet on by them to speake next: who had store of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassadour, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what 20 barbarous manner his owne King had, in few daies past, made Warre upon the gods themselves, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithall they made a pittifull rehearfall of their owne calamities : and faid, that if Philip might have his will, Atolia, and all the rest of Greece, should feele the same that Airica had felt; yea that Aibens it felt, if the walls and the Roman armes had not defended them. Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their owne oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken Armes, went roundly to the point, in hand. They faid, that they had of late made Warre in the Ætolians behalfe, and that the Etolians had without their confent made peace: whereof fince the Etoli-20 ans must excuse themselves, by alledging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leifure to give them aide convenient : fo this excuse being now taken a way, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemy, it concerned the Atolians to take part with them in their war and victory, unlesse they had rather perish with Philip.

It might eafily be perceived, that they which were so vehement, in offring their help ere it was defired, were themselves carried unto the warre by more earnest motives, than a fimple defire to helpe those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may have been the eause, why Dorymachus the Atolian Prætor shifted them off a while with a dilatory answer: though he told his country-men, That by referving themselves, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with 40 those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in generall termes; That overmuch haste was an enemy to good counfaile: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded .But comming neerer to the matter in hand, He passed a Decree, That the Prator might at any time call an Affembly of the States, and therein conclude upon this businesse; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding : whereas otherwise it was unlawfull to treat of fuch affaires, excepting two of their great Parliaments, that were held at let times.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Atolians invade his Dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

Hilip was glad to heare, that the Romans had sped no better in their solicitation of the Liolians. Hee thought them hereby disappointed in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to disappoint them of another. His sonne Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keep the Streights of Pelagonia against the Dardanians;

Dardamans; having with him some of the Kings Councell, to governe both him & his Army. It was judged, as may feeme, that the prefence of the Kings fon, how yong foever, would both encourage his followers, and terrefie the enemies, by making them are least believe, that hee was not weakely attended. And this may have beene the reason, why the same Persew, a few yeeres before this, was in like manner left upon the borders of Liolia by his father; whom earnest businesse called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand: it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet under Heraclides, would ferve to keepe Attalua, with the Rhodians and Romans, from doing harme by Sea, when the Kings backe was turned: who tooke his journey Westward 10 against Sulpicius the Consul.

CHAP.4, S.II.

The Armies met in the Country of the Desfareta, a people in the utmost borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the mountaines of Candavia; that running along from Hamus in the North untill they joyne in the South with Pindus, inclose the Westerne parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in fight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Conful was the first that issued forth of his Campe into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the strength which hee had then about him; and therefore thought it better to fend forth some of his light-armed Mercenaries. and some part of his horse, to entertaine them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driven backe into their Campe. Now although it was for that the King was unwilling to hazzard all at first upon a Cast, and therefore sent for Perfew with his Companies, to increase his owne forces: yet being no leffe unwilling to lose too much in reputation; He made shew a day after, as if he would have fought. He had found the advantage of a place fit for ambush, wherein hee bestowed as many as he thought meet of his Targettiers: and fo gave charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captains, to provoke out the Romans to fight; instructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behave themselves respectively, as opportunity should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambush, having fought upon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might have fuftained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had beene well followed. For when Athenagor as began to fall backe, they charged him fo hotly, that they drave him to an hasty slight, and pursued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not staying to let them runne into the danger, difcovered themselves before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the worke, to which they were appointed. The Conful hereby gathered, that the King had some desire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which he therefore presented the second time; leading forth his Army, and fetting it in order, with Elephants in the front : a kinde of help which the Romans had never used before, but had taken these of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce above fourescore yeeres ere this that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italy, to affright the Romans, who had never seene any of those beasts before. But now the same Romans (whilest possibly some were yet alive, which had known that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greeks have none. Philip had patience to let the Conful brave him at his Trenches: wherein he did wisely: for the Roman had greater need to fight, than He. Sulpicius was unwilling to lose time: neither could he without great danger, lying so neere the Enemy, that was strong in Horse, send his men to fetch in come out of the fields. Wherefore he removed eight miles off: prefuming that Philip would not adventure to meet him on even ground; and so the more boldly he suffered his Forragers to over-runne the Countrey. The King was nothing forry of this; but permitted the Romans to take their good pleasure : even till their prefumption, and his owne supposed feare, should make them carelesse. When this was so come to passe, he tooke all his horse, and light-armed foot, with which he occupied a place in the mid-way, betweene the Forragers and their Campe. There he stayed in Covert with part of his forces; to keepe the passages that none should escape. The rest he sent abroad the Countrey, to fall upon the stragglers: willing them to put all to the fword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The flaughter was great: and those which escaped the hands of them that were sent abroad to scowre the fields lighted all or most of them upon the King and his companies in their flight : so as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Campe had newes of this. But in the end there escaped some: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter CHAP.4. S.II.

went: yet by telling what had happened to themselves, raised a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon fends forth all his horse, and bids them helpe their fellowes where they saw it needfull: He himselfe with the Legions followed. The companies of Horse divided themselves, accordingly as they met with advertisements upon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted upon Philips Troupes, that were canvassing the field, tooke their taske where they found it: But the maine bulke of them fell upon the King himfelfe. They had the difadvantage; as comming fewer, and unprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away : as their fellowes also might have beene, if the King had well bethought himselfe, and given over in time. But while, not contented with such an harvest, he was too greedy about a poore gleaning; the Roman Legions appeared in fight: which emboldened their horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparent, enforced the Macedonians to look to their own safetie. They ran which way they could: &(as menthat lie in waite for others, are feldome heedfull of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemy, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogges, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings horse was slaine under him: and there had he beene cast away, if a loving subject of his had not alighted; mounted him upon his own horse; and delivered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foot was overtaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident rashnes; and the Con-20 ful, with as much dulnesse, for his dayes service. A little longer stay would have delivered the King from these enemies without any blow: fince when all the fields about them were wasted, they must needes have retired backe to the Sea. On the other side, it was not thought unlikely, That if the Romans following the King, had fet upon his Campe, at fuch time as he fled thither, halfe amazed with feare of being either flaine or taken, they might have won it. But that Noble Historian, Livie, (as is commonly his maner) hath judiciously observed, That neither the one, nor the other, were much too blame in this dayes worke. For the maine body of the Kings Army lay fafe in his Campe; and could not be so astonished with the losse of two or three hundred horse, that it should therefore have abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himselfe, he was advertised, that Pleuraius the Illyrian, and the Dardanians, were fallen upon his Country; when they found the passage thereinto open, after Persens was called away from custody of the Streights. This was it which made him adventure to do somwhat betimes; that he might fet the Romans going the fooner & afterwards looke unto his troublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to cleere himselfe of the Romans, as foone as hee might. And to that purpose hee sent unto the Consul; requesting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But in stead of so doing, hee marched away by night, and left fires in his Camp to beguile the enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not flow to follow him. He overtook the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a wooddy ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most 40 open. In making of fuch places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little use; being a fquare battell of pikes, not fit for every ground. The Archers of Crete were judged, and were indeed, more serviceable in that case. But they were few; and their arrows were of small force against the Roman shields. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (fuch as it was) layd open unto the Confull some poore Townes thereabout; which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yeelded for seare. But the spoile of these, and of the fields adjoyning, was not sufficient to maintaine his Army; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardanians, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselves apace out of the Countrey. The King sent Albenagoras to waite upon them home; whilest he himselse went against the Aiolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Aetolians, who had referved himselfe and his Nation unto the event of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once & again: as also that Pleuratus & the Dardanians were fallen upon Macedon; grew no leffe busic on the sudden, than before he had beene wife. He perswaded his Nation to take their time: and so, not staying to proclaime warre, joyned his forces with Aminander the Athamanian; and made invalion upon Thessaly. They tooke and cruelly cruelly facked a few Townes: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger. they might do what they lifted. But Philip came upon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay dispersed, was like to have taken their Camp, if Aminander more warie than the Etolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retrait through his owne mountainous Countrey.

About the same time the Roman Fleet, affisted by Attalwand the Rhodians, had taken some small Ilands in the Aegean Sea. They tooke likewise the Towne of Oreumin the Isle of Eubaa; and some other places thereabout. The Towns were given unto Attalm, after the same Compact that had formerly beene made with the Aetolians: the goods therein found were given unto the Romans; and the people, for flaves. Other attempts on that fide were hindred; either by foule weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of meanes.

Villius the Roman Consul wastes a yeere to no effect. Warre of the Gaules in Italy. An Embassie of the Romans to Carthage, Masanissa, and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdome: and T. Quintius Flaminius is fent against him.

Hus the time ran away: and P. Villius a new Conful tooke charge of the War in Macedon. He was troubled with a mutiny of his oldest Souldiers: whereof two thousand, having served long in Sicil & Africk, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not be fuffered to look unto their owne estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had ferved at Canna: as may feeme by their complaint, of having been long absent from Italy; whither faine they would have returned when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is uncertaine. For the Hiftory of his yeare is lost: whereof the misse is not great, fince he did nothing memorable . Valerius Antius, as we finde in Livie, hath adorned this Villius with Liv. lib. 32. a great exploit against Philip. Yet fince Livie himselfe, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could finde no such thing recorded in any good Author; we may rea-

o fonably beleeve that Villius his yeare was idle. In the beginning of this Macedonian War, the Romans found more trouble than could have beene expected with the Gaules. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and strong Towne, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Asdrubal, had been able to force; was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like fort Cremona was attempted; but faved her feife, taking warning by her neighbours calamity. Amilear a Carthaginian, that stayed behinde Afarubal or Mago, in those parts; was now become Captaine of the Gaules, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they fent Embaffadors to the Carthaginians: giving them to understand. That if they were not wearie of the peace, it behooved them to call home, and deliver up, this their Citizen Amilear, who made war in Italy. Hereunto it was added (perhaps left the meffage might feeme otherwise to have savoured a little of some feare) That of the Fugitive slaves belonging to the Romans, there were some reported to walke up and downe in Carthage: which if it were forthen ought they to be reftored back to their Mafters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadours that were sent on this errand, had further charge to treat with Masanissa, as also with Vermina the sonne of Syphax. Unto Masanissa, besides matter of complement, they were to signifie what pleasure he might doe them, by lending them some of his Numidian Horse, to serve in their Warre against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchfafe unto him the name of King: and promised thereafter to deserve it, by his readinesse in doing them all good ofo fices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter : and said, That having beene, and being still (as they tooke it) their Enemy, He ought first of all to desire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they used not to conferre upon any, save onely upon fuch as had royally deserved it at their hands. The authority to make peace with him, was wholly committed unto these Embassadours, upon such termes as they should thinke fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answer, That they wholly disclaimed Amilear: banishing him, and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitives: they had restored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requifite, give fatisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they fent a great proportion of Corn to Rome; and the like unto the Army that was in Macedon. King Majaniffa would have lent unto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian horse: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadours, to give them entertainement, on the borders of his Kingdome; and without any disputation, agreed with them upon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans busted in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilear and his Gaules: they laide fiege unto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came upon them, fought a battaile with them, and overcame them. Amilcarthe Carthaginian died in this battaile: 10 and the fruit of the victory was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwards should have the managing of warre among those Gaules. So was there good leifure to thinke upon the businesse of Macedon: where Philip was carefully providing to give contentment unto his Subjects, by punishing a bad Counfailour whom they hated; as alfoto affure unto himself the Acheans, by rendring unto them some Townes that he held of theirs ; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome. not onely by exercifing and training his people, but by fortifying the paffages that led thereinto out of Epiria. This was indoing, when Villiu, having unprofitably laboured to finde way into Macedon, taking a journey (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But 29 then came advertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consull, and had Macedonallotted him for his Province; whose comming was expected; and he very shortly arrived at the Army.

6. XIII.

The Romans begin to make war by negotiation. T. Quintius winnes a passage against Philip. Theffaly wasted by Philip, the Romans , and Evolians. The Achaens for saking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treaty of peace , that was vaine. Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

He Romans had not beene wont in former times, to make Warre after fuch a trifling manner. It was their use, to give battaile to the Enemie, as soone as they met with him. If he refused it, they belieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when he had long forborne it (as it would be interpreted) upon knowledge of his owneweaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they began to learne of the fubtle Greekes, the art of Negotiation: wherein hitherto they were not growne fo fine, as within a little while they proved. Their Treasury was poore, & stood indebted,* many yeers after this, unto private men, for part of those monies that had beene borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonalty averse from the Macedonian warre; and had thereby dri- 40 ven the Senators, greedy of the enterprize, to make use of their cunning. Yet being weary of the flow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Army, that they might have the leffe need to relie upon their Confederates. So they levied eight thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they fent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Conful, into Macedon. Their Navie, and other meanes could well have ferved, for the fetting forth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by straining themselves to the most of their ability, they should (besides other difficulties incident unto the sustenance of those that are too many and too farre from home) have bred fome jealousie in their friends of Greece, and thereby have lost some friends, yea, perhaps have increased the number of their 50 enemies, more than of their owne Souldiers. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe unto them, by his Embaffadours; requesting that either they would undertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who invaded it; or else that they would not take it uncourteously, that hee quirted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke unto that which more concerned him. Their answer was remarkeable. They faid, That it was not their manner to use the aide of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could also bee well contented to affoord it;

That they could not honeftly take part with Artalus, their good friend though he were; against Aniochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embassadours, and (as common friends unto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an attonement betweene them. In such loving fashion did they now carry themselves, towards their good friend the King Antiochin; who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Army from the Kingdome of Attalus. But how little they regarded these termes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Phelip, it will very foone appeare.

T. Quintim hasting away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the sup-10 ply decreed unto him; which confifted, for the most part, of old Souldiers, that had served in Spaine and Africk. He found Villing the old Conful, (whom at his comming he presently discharged and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the river of Apfus or Aous. It was manifest, that either the Romans must setch a compasse about, and seek their way into Macedon, through the poore Countrey of the Dassaretians; or else winne, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way; they had already two yeers together mif-spent their time, and beene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of victualls: whereof they could neither carry with them store sufficient, nor finde it on the way. But if they could once get over these Mountains, which divided the South of Epirus from Thessaly, then should they enter into a plentifull Country; and, which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a maner) part of his Kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neverthelesse, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelihood. For the River of Apfus, running along through that valley which alone was open betweene the Mountaines, made it all a deep, Marilo and unpaffable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine rocke by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius affailed to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding himfelfe disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his enemie, who neglected not the guard of them that was very easie; he was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing for the space of forty daves.

This long time of rest gave hope unto Philip, that the war might bee ended by composition, upon some reasonable termes. He therefore so dealt with some of the Epirois, (among whom he had many friends) that Hee and the Confull had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Confull would have him to fet all Townes of Greece at liberty; and to make amends for the injuries, which he had done to many people in his late Warres. Philip was contented to give liberty to those whom he had subdued of late: but unto fuch, as had beene long fubject unto him and his Ancestors, He thought it against all reason, that he should relinquish his claime and dominion over them. He also faid, That as farre forth as it should appeare that he had done wrong unto any Towne or people whatfoever, He could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seeme convenient in the judgement of some free State, that had not beene interessed in those quarrells. But herewithall Quintius was not satisfied. There needed (he said) no judgement or compromise; for a smuch as it was apparent, that Philip had alwayes beene the Invader; and had not made warre, as one provoked, in his owne defence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars: and when the Conful was required to name those Towns, that hee would have to be set at liberty; the first that hee named were the Thessalians: These had beene subjects (though conditional) unto the Macedonian Kings, ever fince the dayes of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as foone as Flaminius had named the Theffalians; the King in a rage demanded what sharper condition Hee would have laid upon him, had he beene but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly he flang away; refusing to heare any more of such dis-

After this the Confull strove in vaine two or three dayes together, to have prevailed against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himlesterand could not resolve what course to take: there came to him an Heards-man sent from Charopus a Prince of the Egirois that favoured the Romans, who having long kept beafts in those Mountaines, was throughly acquainted with all by paths, and thereforeundertooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should have advantage of the Enemy. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was falt bound: and being promifed a great reward, in case he made good his word, had such Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They travailed by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and rested in the day-time, for seare of being discovered. When they had recovered the hill-tops, and were above the Macedonians, (though undiscovered by them, because at their backs) they raised a great smoke, whereby they gave notice of their successe unto the Consul. Some skirmishes, whilest these were on they journy, T. Quinting had held with the Macedonian; thereby to avert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he faw the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained unto the place whither they were fent, he pressed as neere as he could unto the Enemies 10 Campe, and affailed them in their strength. He prevailed as little as informer times, untill the shoutings of those that ran downe the hill, and charged Philip on the backe, aftonished so the Macedonians, that they betooke themselves to flight. The King, upon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to save himselse. Yet anon considering, that the difficulty of the paffage must needes hinder the Romans from pursuing him: he made a stand at the end of five miles, and gathered there together his broken troups, of whom he found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Campe and provisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians began to stand in feare, lest being driven from a place of such advantage, they should hardly make good their party against the Enemy, upon equall ground. 20 Neither was Philip himselfe much better perswaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hastie retrait he could visit, to for fake their Townes and Countrie, carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoiling all the rest. But all of them could not be perswaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their King) their ancient habitations, and all the fubstance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly refifted him; which they might the better doe, for that he could not stay to use any great compulsion. He also himselse tooke it very grievously, that he was driven to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitfull Countrey, which had ever been well affected unto him: so that a little hinderance did serve, to make him breake off his purpose, and withdraw himselfe home into his Kingdome of Macedon.

The Atolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were even in a readinesse to invade Theffalie; whereinto the wayes lay more open, out of their severall Countries. When therefore they heard for certainty, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they foreslowed nor the occasion, but made all speed, each of them to lay hold upon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten fo much before his comming, that he, in gleaning after their harvest, could not finde enough to maintaine his Army. Thus were the poore Thessalians, of whose liberty the Romans a few dayes fince had made shew to be very desirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turne themselves, or whom to avoide. T. Quinius wonne Phaleria by affault: Metropolis and Piera yeelded unto him. Rhage 40 he besteged : and having made a faire breach, yet was unable to force it; so stoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, having somewhat recollected his spirits, hovered about Tempe with his Army, thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consult, having well-neere spent his victuals, and feeing no hope to prevaile at Rhage; brake up his fiege, and departed out of Theffaly. He had appointed his ships of burden to meete him at Anticyra, an Haven Towne of Phocis, on the Gulph of Corinth : which Countrey being friend to the Macedonian, he presently invaded; nor so much for harred unto the people, as because it lay conveniently seated betweene Thessay and other regions, wherein he had businesse, or was shortly like to have. Many Townes in Phocis he wonne by affault: many were yeelded up unto him for feare; and within short space he had (in effect) mastered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Confuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this warre, joyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They wonne two Cities in Eubaa; and afterward laid fiege unto Cenchree, an Haven and Arcenall of the Corinihians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprise did somewhat helpe forward the Acheans, in their defire to leave the part of Philip: fince it might come to passe, that Co with it selfe, ere long time were spent; and that Centhree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be rendred unto their Nation; by favour of the Romans.

But there were other motives, inducing the Acheans to preferre the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had been long accustomed. For this King had fo many waies offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best courfe to rid their hands of him; whileft being intangled in a dangerous War, he wanted meanes to hinder the execution of fuch counfell as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practifes to make himselfe their absolute Lord: his poysoning of Aratus their old Governour: His false dealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his owne dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed; had caused them long since to hold him as a necessary evill, even whilest they were unable to be without his affiftance. But fince by the vertue of Philopamen, they were grown somewhat confident in their own strength, so as without the Macedonians helpe they could as well fubfift, as having him to friend: then did they onely think how evill he was; and thereupon rejoyce the more in that he was become no longer necessary. It angred him to perceive how they stood affected: and therefore he fent murderers to take away the life of * Philopamen. But failing in this enterprife; and being detected, he did Plut in the Philopamen. thereby onely fet fire to the Wood, which was throughly dry before, and prepared to logan burn. Philopamen wrought so with the Achaens, that no discourse was more familiar with Juffelia. to them, than what great cause they had to withdraw themselves from the Macedonian.Cycliadas, a principall man among them, and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for shewing himselfe passionate in the cause of Philip; and Aristanus chosen Prætor, who laboured to joyne them in fociety with the Romans. These newes were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadors were sent from the Romans, and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians and Athenians, to treat with the Acheans, making promise, that they should have Corinth restored unto them, if they would for fake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Acheans was held at Sycion, to deliberate and resolve in this weighty case. Therein the Romans and their adherents defired the Achaans to joyne with them in making Warre upon Philip. Contrariwife, 30 the Embaffadors of Philip, whom he had also fent for this businesse, admonishing the Acheans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due unto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassadors did no way advance their Masters cause. Rather it gave the Acheans to underftand. That he, who could be fatisfied with fo little at their hands, knew himfelfe unable to gratifie them in any reciprocall demand. Yet were there many in that great Councell; who remembring the benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preservation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sense of late injuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the suture; prevailed against the memory of those old good turnes, which he (and Antigonus beforehim) had partly fold unto them, and partly had u-40 fed as baites, whereby to allure them into absolute subjection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance; That the Romans were strong, and likely to prevaile in the end. So after much altercation, the Decree paffed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this War. With Attalus and the Rhodians, they forthwith entred into fociety: with the Romans (because no League would be of force, untill the Senare and people had approved it) they forbore to decree any fociety at the present, untill the returne of those Embassadors from Rome, which they determined to fend thither of purpose. The Megalopolitans, Dymeans, and Argives, having done their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound; rose up out of the Councell, and departed before the passing of the Decree; which they could not refift, nor yet with honefty thereto give affent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argives had so little thanke; that all the rest of the Acheans may be the better held excused for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soone after this, upon a folemine day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discovered it selfe so plainely, in the behalfe of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Cirie into his hands, if they might have any fmall affiftance. Philocles a Lievtenant of the Kings, lay then in Covinth, which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Nonne Argos :

CHAP. 4. S.12.

Argos; whither comming on a fudden, and finding the multitude ready to joine with him, He casily compelled the Achean Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth, and some other Townes, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, fo they gave him hope to obtaine fome good end by Treaty, whilest as yet with his honour he might seeke it: and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Conful would shortly be chosen; who should take the worke out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the sooner. Titus had the like respect unto himselse; and therefore thought it best, since more could not bee done, to pre-dispose things unto a Conclusion, for his owne reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-shore, in the Bay then called the Malian or Laman Bay, now (as is supposed) the Gulfe of Ziton, in the Egean Sea, or Archipelago. Thither 10 came Titus with Aminander the Athamanian; an Embaffador of Attalus; the Admiral of Rhodes; and some Agents for the Atolians and Acheans. Philip had with him some few of his owne Captaines, and Cycliadas, lately banished for his sake out of Achaia. He refufed to come on shore: though fearing (as he said) none but the immortall Gods: yet misdoubting some treacherie in the Asolians. The demands of Titus in behalfe of the Romans, were, That he should set all Cities of Greece at liberty; deliver up to the Romans and their Confederates, all prisoners which he had of theirs, and Renegadoes; likewise whatfoever he held of theirs in Illyria: and whatfoever about Greece or Afia he had gotten from Ptolomy then King of Egypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded restitution to be made, entire of Ships, Townes, and Temples by him taken and spoyled in 20 the late War between them. The Rhodians would have againe the Country of Peraa. lying over against their Iland; as also that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of divers Townes about the Hellespont, and other Havens of their friends. The Acheans defired restitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not unjustly, quarrell with him; the other had beene long his owne by their confent. The Atolians took upon them angerly, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, even out of the whole Countrey, leaving it free; and withall to deliver up unto them, what soever he held that had at any time been theirs. Neither were they herewithall content: but infolently declaymed against him, for that which he had lately done in Thessaly; corrup-30 ting(asthey faid) the rewards of the Victors, by destroying, when hee was vanquished, those Townes, which else they might have gotten. To answer these malapart Atolians, Philip commanded his Gallie to be rowed nearer the shore. But they began to plie him afresh: telling him that he must obey his betters, unlesse he were able to defend himfelfe by force of Armes. He answered them (as he was much given to gybing) with sundry scoffes; and especially with one, which made the Roman Conful understand, what manner of companions these Ætolians were. For he faid, That he had often dealt with them; as likewise the best of the Greeks; desiring them to abrogate a wicked Law, which permitted them to take foyle from spoyle: yet could he get no better an answer, than that they would sooner take Etolia out of Etolia. Titus wondred what might be the meaning 40 of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable custome, as often as Warre happened betweene their friends, to hold up the quarrell by fending Voluntaries to serve on both sides, that should spoyle both the one and the other. As for the liberty of Greece, Hee faid it was strange that the Atolians should bee so carefull thereof, fince divers. Tribes of their owne, which he there named, were indeed no Grecians: wherefore hee would faine know, whether the Romans would give him leave to make flaves of those Atolians, which were no Greekes. Titus hereat smiled, and was no whit offended, to heare the Ætolians well ratled up; touching whom he began to understand, how odious they were in all the Country. As for that generall demand of fetting all Greece at liberty, Philip acknowledged, that it might well befeeme 50 the greatnesse of the Romans; though he would also consider, what might bekeeme his owne dignity. But that the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other petric Estates, should thus presume, under countenance of the Romans, to take upon them, as if by their great might hee should beethereunto compelled: it was, hee said, a strange and ridiculous insolence. The Achaens hee charged with much ingratitude; reciting against them fome Decrees of their owne; wherein they had loaden both Amigonus and him, with more than humane honours. Nevertheleffe he faid, that he would render Argos unto them: but as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himselfe.

Thus he addressed himselfe wholly to the Roman Generall; unto whom if he could give fatisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late War (he faid) was onely defensive; they having beene the offerers: or if he gave them any occasion, it was onely in helping Prusias, his sonne-in-law; neither did he see why they should rather seeke amends at his hands, that he at theirs. For whereas they complayned, that, spoyling a Temple of Venus, he had cut downe the Grove, and pleasant walkes thereabouts: what could be doe more, than fend Gardners thither with young plants; if one King of another would stand to aske such recompence ? Thus he jested the matter out: but offered nevertheleffe, in honour of the Romans, to give backe the Region of Pe-10 reato the Rhodians; as likewise to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof hee had then possession. Thus ended that dayes conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leifure to thinke upon the Articles, which were many, and he ill provided of Counsell, wherewith to advise about them. For your being so ill provided of Counsell (faid Titus) you may even thanke your selfe; as having murdered all your friends. that were wont to advise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, untill it was late at night; excufing his long flay by the weightinesse of the things propounded, whereon he could not fuddenly tell how to refolve. But it was believed, that he thereby fought to abridge the Ætolians of leifure to raile at him. And this was the more likely, for that he defired conference in private with the Roman Generall. The fumme of his discourse. 20 as Titms afterward related it, was, That he would give the Acheans both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render unto Attalus and the Rhodians, what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Atolians, that he would grant some part of their demands; and to the Romans, what foever they did challenge. This when Titus his affociates heard, they exclaymed against it, saving. That if the King were suffered to retain any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which he now rendred up. The noyse that they made came to Philips eare: who thereupon defired a third day of meeting; and protested, that if he could not perswade them, he would suffer himselfe to bee perswaded by them. So the third day they met early in the morning: at what time the King intreated them all, that they would with fincere affection hearken untogood 30 offers of peace; and immediately conclude it; if they could like well of those Conditions which he had already tendred, or otherwise that they would make truce with him for the prefent, and let him fend Embaffadors to Rome, where he would referre himselfe to the courtefie of the Senate.

This was even as Quintius would have it: who flood in doubt, left a new Conful might happen to defraud him of the honour which he expected by ending of the Warre. So he easily prevailed with the rest, to assent hereunto: for as it was Winter, a time unfit for fervice in the War; and fince, without authority of the Senate, he should be unable to proceed refolvedly either in Warre or Peace. Further he willed them to fend their feverall Embassadors to Rome, which intimating unto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip from obtaining any thing to their prejudice. Among the rest, he perswaded King Aninander to make a journey to Rome in person. knowing well, that the name of a King together with the confluence of formany Embassadors, would ferve to make his owne actions more glorious in the City. All this tended to procure that his own Command of the Army in Greece might be prorogued. And to the fame end had he dealt with fome of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already(though as yet he knew not fo much) obtained it for him, partly by their authority, partly by good reasons which they alledged unto the Senate.

The Embaffadours of the Greekes, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more desirous of victory, 50 than of fatisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in undertaking to set Greece at liberty. But this (they said) could never be effected; unlesse especiall care were taken, that the King should be dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Country, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in servility; that the Senate agreed to have it even so as they defired. When therfore the Embassadors of Philip were brought in, and began to have made a long Oration; they were briefly cut off in the middest of their Preface, with this one demand: Whether their Master would yeeld up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. Hereto they made answer, That concerning those places, the Nonno 2

King had given them no direction or commission what to say or doe. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips defire of peace; wherein they faid he did no better than triflle. Yet might his Embassadors have truly said, That neither the Attolians, Achaans, nor any of their fellowes, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias should be yeelded up. For which of them indeed could make any claime to either of these Towns ? As for Corinth, whereto the Achaans had some right; (though their right were no better, than that, having stolne it from One Macedonian king in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargaine unto an Other) Philip had already condescended to give it back unto them. And this perhaps would have been alledged, even against the Greeks, in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintius his 10 friends; that so he might have had the honor to conclude the war, if a successor had been decreed unto him. But fince he was appointed to continue Generall : neither his friends at Rome, nor he himselfe, after the returne of the Embassadors into Greece, cared to give

eare unto any talke of peace. Philip, seeing that his Achdans had forfaken him, and joyned with their common enemies; thought even to deale with them in the like manner, by reconciling him felfe unto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeares past, since the Laced eme. wians under Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne ftrength, had been almost firong enough both for the Macedonians and Achaens together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force confifted, in a manner, wholly in his Mercenaries : for 16 he was a Tyrant, though stiling himselse King. Yet he sorely vexed the Achaans: and therefore seemed to Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be won. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Town of Argos, which could not otherwise be eafily defended, should bee configued over into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serve to tie him fast unto the Macedonian. Philocles the Kings Lievtenant, who was appointed to deale with Nabis, added further, That it was his Mafters purpose to make a streight alliance with the Laced amonian, by giving some daughters of his owne in marriage unto Nabis his fons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made fome foruple in accepting the Towne of Argos; unlesse by decree of the Citizens themselves hee might be called into it. Hereabout Philocles dealt with the Argives: but found them fo 30 averse, that, in open assembly of the people, they detested the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought he had thereby a good occasion to rob and fliece them. So he willed Philocles, without more adoe, to make over the Town which he was ready to receive. Philocles accordingly did let him with his Army into it by night; and gave him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argives, who for very love had forsakenthe Acheans, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himself Master of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, understanding how things went, fled out of the City at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that stayed behinde, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver- Alfo 240 great imposition of money was laid upon all those that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more adoe. But if any stood long upon the matter: or played the theeves in purloyning their owne goods; they were put to the whip, and besides losse of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes: namely, such as might ferve to make him gracious with the rascall multitude: abrogating all debts, and dividing the Lands of the rich among the poore. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath been an old custome of Tyrants, to affure themselves of the Vulgar for a time.

As foon as Nabis had gotten Argos, He fent the newes to T. Quintins; and offered to joyne with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he tooke the pains to crosse over 10 thing aptly for his Phalanx. Neverthelesse hee found convenient roome, wherein to the Streights into Peloponnesus, there to meet with Nabis. They had soon agreed (though King Attalas, who was prefent with the Conful, made some cavill touching Argos) and the Tyrantlent unto the Roman, fixe hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as also heagre ed with the Acheans, upon a Truce for foure moneths, referving the finall conclusion of peace between them untill the War of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long. 6. The battellat Cynoscephalæ, wherein Philip was vanquished by T. Quintius-

*Itus Quintius, as soone as he understood that he was appointed to have Command of the Army, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleafure of the Senate; made all things ready for diligent pursuit of the Warre. The like did Philip: who having failed in his negotiation of peace, and no leffe failed in 10 his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that War; meant afterwards wholly to relic upon himfelfe.

Titus had in his Army about fixe and twenty thousand: and Philip a proportionable Platin vitit. 2. number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemy intended Flora, to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Theffaly, and thereupon addressed himselfe to feeke him out. They had like to have met unawares, neare unto the City of Phera: where the vant-currers on both fides discovered each other; and sent word thereof unto their feverall Captains. But neither of them were over hafty to commit all to hazzard upon fo short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred Horse, with as many light armed Foot, to make a better discovery. These met, and sought a long 20 while: returning finally' kinto their feverall Camps, with little advantage unto either fide. The Country au t Phera was thick fet with Trees : and otherwise full of Gardens and mud-walles; which made it unproper for service of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remove back into Scotufa, in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully ferved with all necessaries. Titus conceived aright his meaning: and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards; were it only to waste the Country. There lay betweene them a great ledge of hils, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other took. Neverthelesse they encamped not farre a funder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them understood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempestuous; and forced each 30 of them to take up his lodging where hee found it by chance. Then fent they forth discoverers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worse. But Phylip anon sent in such strong fupply; that if the refistance of the Etolians had not been desperate, the Romans their fellowes had been driven back into their Camp. Yet all refiftance notwithstanding, the Macedonians prevailed: fo that Titus himselfe was faine to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the defeat of all their Horse, to animate those which were in flight.

It was altogether besides the Kings purpose to put the fortune of a battell in trust that day, with so much of his Estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came to him thick and tumultuoufly, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his owne, if hee could use an occasion, the like whereof he should not often finde. This cansed him to alter his purpose: insomuch as he embattelled his men; and climbed up those hils, which, for that the knops thereon had some resemblance unto Dogs heads, were called, by a word fignifying as much, Cynoscephala. As soone as he was on the hill-top; it did him good to fee that they of his owne light armature were buffe in fight, almost at the very Campe of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so farre. Hee had also liberty to choose his ground, as might serve best his advantage: for a smuch as the Romans were quite driven from all parts of the Hill. But of this commodity he could make no great ule: the roughnesse of the place among those Dogs heads, as they were called, serving nomarshall the one part of his Army: and gave order unto his Captaines, to follow with the rest; embattelling them as they might. Whilest hee was doing this: He perceived that his Horsemen and light armature began to shrinke; as being fallen upon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driven to recoyle. He fees forward to helpe them: and they no leffe hastily draw unto him for frecour; having the Romans not far behinde of worke. For this Phalanx being a great square battell of armed pikes, like in all points to those which are now used in our moderne Warres: and being in like manner used, as are ours; was not to be refifted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it selfe heldtogether undissolved. The Macedonians were embattelled in very close order: for that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the pikes of the first ranke had their points advanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no marvell if the Romans gave back: every one of them being troubled (as it were) with tenne enemies at once; and not able to come nearer to the next of them, than the length of a doozen foot or thereabout. Titus finding this, and not knowing how to remedic it; was greatly troubled: for that still the Phalanx bare downe all which came in the way. But in the meane while he observed, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much unevennesse of the ground, to put themselves in order: so as either they kept their places on the Hil-tops; or else (which was worse) upon defire either of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to be partakers in the work, ran foolishly along by the side of their fellowes, which were occupied

As the Legions began to climbe the Hill; Philip commanded those of his Phalanx to charge their pikes, and entertaine them. Here Titus found an extreme difficult piece Nanan 3

Of this their disorder Hee made great and present use. He caused the right wingof his Battell to march up the Hill against these ill-ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to dispute what should be done in such a case, than well advised what to doe; as having no one man appointed, 20 to command that part inchiefe. Indeed if they should have done their best, it could not have served; fince the ground whereon they stood, made their weapons unusefull. For let it be supposed, that Philip having fixe and twenty thousand in his Armie (as he is faid to have been equall to the Enemy in number) had foure thousand Horse, foure thousand Targettiers, and foure thousand light-armed: so shall there remaine fourteene thousand Pikes; whereof he himselfe had embattelled the one halfe in a Phalanx; theother halfe in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is ready now to charge. The Phalanx having usually fixteene in File, must, when it consisted of seven thousand, have welneare foure hundred and forty in ranke : but foure hundred would ferve, to make a Front long enough; the other forty or feven and thirty Files might bee cut off, and 30 reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Except. & Polyb. Polybins doth, to every man of them three foote of ground: this Front must have occupied twelve hundred foote, or two hundred and forty paces; that is, very neare a quarter of a mile in length. Such a space of open Champaine, free from incumberance of Trees, Ditches, Hillockes, or the like impediments, that must of necessity dis-joyne this close battell of the Phalanx; was not every where to bee found. Here at Cynoscephala Philip had so much roome, as would onely suffice for the one halfe of his men; the rest were faine to stand still and looke about them, being hindered from putting themselves in order, by the roughnesse of the Dogges heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindred from comming 40 up unto them; nor found any difficulty in mastering those enemies, whose feet were in a manner bound by the discommodity of the place. The very first impression of the Elephants, caused them to give backe; and the comming on of the Legions, to betake themselves to flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonel, seeing the victory on that part affured, left the profecution of it unto others: and being followed by twenty Enfignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by some two thousand men, tooke in hand a notable piece of worke; and mainely helpefull to making of the victory compleate. Hee confidered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans, was run on fo farre: as that himselfe with his sellowes, in mounting the hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten above the Kings head. Wherefore hee turned to the 50 left hand, and making downe the hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell upon it in the Rere-The hindermost rankes of the Phalanx, all of them indeede save the first five, were accustomed, when the battels came to joyning, to carry their pikes upright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their fore-men: and so were they doing at the present. This was another great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx. That it served neither for offence nor defence, except onely in front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when hee was to fight with Dariss in Mesopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in fuch order, that all the foure fides of it were as so many frontslooking fundry waves because he expected that he should be encompassed round: yet is it to be understood, that herein he altered theusuall forme; as also at the same time he embattailed his men in loose order, that so with ease they might turne their weapons which way need should require. Likewise it is to be considered. That Alexanders men being thus dispofed, were fit onely to keep their owne ground; not being able to follow upon the enemy, unleffe their hindmost rankes could have marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no fuch provision for refistance. Therefore his men, being other wife unable to help them felves, threw down their weapons & fled. The king him felf had thought untill now, that the fortune of the battell was every where alike, and the day his own. But to hearing the noise behind him, and turning a little aside with a troup of horse, to see how all went; when he beheld his men casting downe their weapons, and the Romans at his back on the higher ground; he prefently betook himselfeto flight. Neither staid heafterwards in any place (except only a fmall while about Tempe, there to collect fuch as were dispersed in this overthrow) untill he was gotten into his own kingdome of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Armie in this battell, about feven hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thousand were slaine; and five thousand taken prisoners.

6. XV.

T. Quintius falleth out with the Ætolians, and grants truce unto Philip, with conditions upon which the peace is ratified. Liberty proclaimed unto the Greekes. The Romans quarrell with Antiochus.

THe Ætolians wonderfully vaunted themselves; and desired to have it noysed through all Greece, that the victory at Cynoscephalæ was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the bootie by facking the Macedonian Camp, whileft the Romans were busied in the chase. Titus therefore being offended both at their vain-glory, & at their ravenous condition; purposed to teach them better maners, by regarding them as flightly, as they thought highly of themselves. 30 He also well perceived, That by using them with any extraordinary favour, he should greatly offend the rest of his confederates in Greece; who detested the Eiolians much more vehemently, than ever they had done the Macedonians. But this displeasure brake not forth vet a while. After the battell Titus made hafte unto Lariffa,a Citie in Theffalie, which he presently tooke. Before his comming, Philip had fent thither one of his Courtiers to burne all his letters, and passages what soever in writing, betwixt him and others: of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of fo much adverfitie, he forgot not to provide for the fafetie of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Lariffa might well perceive, that he gave them as already lost. Wherefore we finde 40 not that they, or any of their Neighbors, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the fame time, the town of Leucas, bordering upon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleet, and very soone after, all the Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Atolians ever true to Philip; gave up themselves unto the Romans, hearing of the victory at Cynoscephala. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Parea, a Region of the Continent over against the Iland; whereof they had demanded resti-

Greeks: forafmuch as they awaited not the good leafure of the Romans; but with an Army of their own and some helpe which they borrowed of the Achaens and other their friends, gave battell to Dinocrates the kings Lievtenant, wherein they had the victory, and 50 consequently recovered the whole Province .It angred Philip worse than all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to invade his kingdome; wasting and spoyling, as if all had bin abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Armie inall hafte of fix thousand foot and five hundred horse: wherewith comming upon them, he drave them, with little or no losse of his owne, and great slaughter of theirs, haftily out of the kingdome. Which done he returned to Theffalonica.

with Cycliadas the banished Achaan, in whom he reposed much confidence, Embassadors unto Titu. These had conference a long while in private, with Titus and some of his Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wife dismissed. It seemes that they had Commission, to referre all unto Titus his owne discretion; as Philip himselfe in few dayes afterdid. There was granted unto him a Truce for fifteenedayes: in which time, the King himselfe might come and speake with the Roman Generall. In the mean feafon many fuspicious rumours went of Tirm, as if he had beene corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greeks his Confederates. Of these bruits the Ætolians were chiefe authors: who being wont to regard neither friendship nor honestie, where profit led them a wrong way, judged alike of all men 10 elfe. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had fent letters unto his Affociates; willing them to have their Agents ready by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treaty should be held. There when they were all affembled, they entred into confultation before the Kings arrivall, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them ali, and for every estate in particular. The poor king Aminander befought them all, & especially the Romans, that they would thinke upon him; and, confidering his weakenesse which he confessed, make such provifion, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreake his anger upon him who was not able to refift. Then spake Alexander, one of the Ætolians: who commending Titus for somuch as he had thus affembled the Confe-20 derates to advise upon their own good, and had willed them to deliver their minds freely: added, That in the maine of the purpose which he had in hand, he was utterly deceived: for that by making peace with Philip, he could neither affure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their liberty. There was, he faid, none other end to be made of the war, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the faire promises made by Tans himselfe unto the Greeks, than the chasing of Philip quite out of his kingdome. And to this effect he made a long discourse . But Trus answered, That this Etolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleasure of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the laudable customes which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to seeke the utter destruction of any King or 20 Nation, at such time as they first made warre with them; untill by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessity, to take such a rigorous course. And hereof he alledged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victory, to generous minds, was onely an inducement to moderation. As concerning the publike benefit of Greece, it was (he faid) expedient, that the kingdome of Macedon should be greatly weakened and brought low; not that it should be utterly destroyed: for a smuch as it served as a barre to the Thracians, Gaules, and a multitude of other falvage Nations, which would foone over-flow the whole continent of Greece, if this kingdome were not interposed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yeeld unto those demands, wherewith he had pressed him in the former Treaty; then was there no reason to deny him peace. As for 40 the Ætolians: if they thought otherwise, it should be at their owne pleasure, to take counsell apart for themselves as they thought good. Then began Fhaneas, another of the Atolians, to fay, that all was come to nothing; for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greekes, no lesse than he had done in time before. But Time interrupted him, and bad him leave his babbling; faying, That himselfe would take such order, as that Philip, were he never so desirous, should thenceforth not have it in his power to molest the Greekes.

The fifth Booke of the first part

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Time used friendly: and suffering him to repose himselfe that night, held a Councell the day following; wherein the King yeelded unto all that had beene required at his hands; offring yet further to stand to the 50 good pleasure of the Senate, if they would have more added to the Conditions. Phaneasthe Atolian, infulting over him, faid it was to be hoped, that he would then at length give up to the £10hans a many of Townes, (which he there named) bidding him speake whether he would or no. His answer was, that they might take them all . But Titus interpoling himselfe, said it should be otherwise. These were These alian Townes, and should be all free: one of them onely excepted, which not long agoe had refused to commit it felf to the faith of the Romans, and therefore should now be given to the Liolians. Hereat Phaneas cried out, that it was too great an injury, thus to be defrauded of the Townes

Townes that had fometime belonged unto their Common-weale. Rather he willed Tito confider that by an ancient Covenant between him and the Romans, all the towns taken ought to be their own, and the Romans to have nothing fave the pillage & captives. It is true, that there had bin fuch a condition in the former war: but it ceased to be of any validations foon as the Etolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gave them to understand; asking them whether they thought it reasonable, that all the towns in Greece, which had let in the Romans by composition, should be delivered into subjection of the Atolians. The rest of the Consederates were very much delighted with these angry paffages between the Roman and the Atolians: neither had they great reason to 10 feare any hard measure; fince Titus was so earnest in behalfe of those Theffalians, to give them liberty, though they had stood out against him, even till very fear made them open their gates. Wherefore they opposed not themselves; but gave their consent willingly unto a Truce for foure Moneths.

The chiefe cause that moved True to grant peace so readily to the Macedonian, befides that landable custome by him before alledged, was, the fame of Antiochus his comming with an army from Syria, and drawing neere toward Europe. Hee had also perhaps yet a greater motive; even the confideration that his fucceffor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the war should happen to be protracted. And he was in the right. For when his letters, together with Embaffadors from the Macedonian, and fun-20 dry States of Greece, came unto Rome, new Confuls were chosen: who (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly against the peace; alledging frivolous matter of their owne suspition, in hope to get the honour of concluding the war. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, between the Embassadours of Philip, offring to stand to whatsoever was demanded; and the letters of Titue, preffing them to accept this offer, on the one fide; and the importunitie of the Conful on the other; who faid, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the King would rebell, as foone as the Army was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Affembly of the People; by whose soveraigne authority it was concluded, that Peace should be granted to the King. So ten Embassadors were sent from Rome o over into Greece: in which number were they that had bin Confuls before Time: and it was ordained by their advice, that Tim should goe through with the businesse of Peace. These would very faine have retained those three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcie, and Demetrias, untill the estate of Greece were somewhat better settled. But finally, Titwo prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred unto the Acheans; and all the other Greek towns which Philip held, as well in Afia as in Greece, restored unto

But I finde not that he observed this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Four hundred talents he had already delivered to Tum, together with his younger fon Demerrim, to remaine as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at fuch time as he lately fent his Embaffadors to Rome: when it was promifed, that the money, and his fonne, should be restored backe unto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as part of the thousand talents, I cannot finde: and it feemeth otherwise, for a finuch as young Demetrius, who, together with those foure hundred talents, was given for hostage, remained still in custody of the Romans, as a part of the bargaine which Time formerly had made. Letters also were then fent by Titus unto Prusias King of Bithynia: giving him to understand, what agreement was made with Philip in behalfe of the Greeks, and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Ciani, most miserably spoyled and oppressed by Philip, to gratifie this Bubyman his fon-in-law, should be restored to liberty, and permitted to enjoy the fame benefit of the Romans, which other of their nation did. What

of Prusias to their will. All Greece rejoyced at the good bargain which Tinu had made with Philip. Only the Ætolians found themselves agreeved that they were utterly neglected: which was to the rest no small part of their contentment. The Bicotians continued to favour the Macedonian; and thereby occasioned much trouble unto themselves. There were someamong them well affected to the Romans: who, feeing how things were like to goe, made their complaint unto Titas; faying, that they were no better than loft, for the good will which they had borne unto him; unleffe at this time, when he lay close by them with 10 his Armie, their Prætor, which was head of the opposite Faction, might be made away. Tirm refused to have a hand in the execution, yet neverthelesse did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to have kept themselves undiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those which were put to torture the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans; in such wise, that how soever they durst not take Armes against them, yet such of them as they found flraggling from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Countrey. This was detected within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Barrians, to have the murderers delivered into his hands; and for five hundred fouldiers, which he had loft by them, to have paid unto him five hundred Talents. In flead 20 of making any fuch amends, they paid him with excuses; which he would not take as good fatisfaction. He fends Embaffactours to the Achaans and Athenians, informing them what had happed: and requested them not to take it amisse, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserved. Herewithall he falls to wasting their country; and befregeth two fuch towns of theirs, as did feeme to be most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadors of the Acheans and Athenians (especially of the Achaans, who offered, if he needed them, to help him in this war; yet befought him rather to grant peace unto the Bootsans) prevailed fo far with him, that he was pacified with thirty Talents, and the punishment of such as were known offenders.

In like fort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some a-30 mong them rejoicing that they were free from the Macedonian; others greatly doubting that the Romane would prove a worse neighbour. The Etolian would have bin glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumours abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their own hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greekes, conceive, that this Macedonian war ferved as an introduction to the War to be made in Afia against King Aniochus; where grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progresse of bad rumors, when the Ishmian games were held, which in time of peace were never without great folemnity and concourse; Truss in that great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Se- 40 nate and people of Rome, and Tim Quintim Flaminim the General, having vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did will to be at libertie, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and living at their own Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Euboeans, Achaans of Phthioris, Magnefians, Theffalians, and Perrhabians. The fuddenneffe of this Proclamation aftonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout, yet presently they cried out to heare it again, as if they durst scarce credit their own ears. The Greeks were Crafts-masters in the Art of giving thankes, which they rendred now to T. Quinim with so great affection, as that they had well-neere smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of the Greeks, was like to be much more availeable unto the Romans 50 in their warre againft Antiochus, than could have beene the possession of a few Townes, yea or of all those Provinces which were named in the Proclamation. Upon considence hereof, no sooner were the Isthmiangames at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gave audience to Hagestanax and Lysius, king Antiochus his Embassadours: whom they willed to signific unto their Lord, That he should doe well to abstain from the free cities in Asia, and not vexe them with warras also to restore whatsoever he hadoccupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolomy or Philip. Moreover they willed him by these his Embassadors, that he should not passe over his Army into Europe;

adding, That fome of them would visit him in person ere it were long, to talke with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises unto the Greeks; to the rest they gave what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrians they gave unto the Atolians; whom they thought it no wisedome to offend overmuch, being shortly to take a greater work in hand. The Achaens of Philiotic they annexed unto the Thessalians; all save the town of Thebes in Phihioris, the same which had bin abandoned by T. Quinting to the Etolians in the last Treaty with Philip. The Etolians contended very earnestly about Pharsalus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatory answer, and rejected unto the Senate: for howsoever somewhat the Councell might to favor them, yet was it not meet that they should have their will, as it were indespight of Tim. So the Acheans were reftored Cornib, Triphylia & Herea, So the Corinibians were made free indeed, (though the Romans yet; a while kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the Achaan common-wealth, enjoyed their liberty in as absolute maner as they could defire. To Pleurains the Illyrian were given one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip: and upon Aminander were bestowed those Castles, which he had gotten from Philip during this war; to reign in them & the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodians had bin their owne Carvers. Attalus was dead a little before the Victory; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would have given the towns of Oreum and Ereto tria, in the Ile of Eubæa, to his fon and fucceffor King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded that these as well as the rest of the Eubaans, should be suffered to enjoy their liberty. Oreftis, alittle Province of the kingdome of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yeelded unto the Romans long ere this, and fince continued true to them: for which cause it was also set at liberty, and made a free estate by it self.

These businesses being dispatcht, it remained, that all care should boused, not how to avoid the war with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most case and prosperity. Wherefore Embassadours were sent, both to Antiochus himselfe, to pick matter of quarrell; and about unto others, to pre-dispose them unto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre against this King the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadors and Agents dealt and sped abroad; I referre unto another place.

a . Ti . a siquip is sitte in a Loing ning (185: It)

What Kings of the races of Selencus and Ptolomic reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the Great.

Eleucus Nicator, the first of his race, King of Asia and Syria, dyed in the end of the hundred twenty and fourth Olympiad. He was trecherously staine by Prolomie Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos; having (as is faid) been warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fatall place of his death. But I never have read that any mans life hath beene preserved, or any mischance avoyded by the predictions offuch Divellish Oracles. Rather I believe, that many such predictions of the Heathen Gods, have been ante-dated by their Priests; or by others which devided them after the event.

Antiochus Soier, the sonne and heire of this Seleucus, was dearely beloved of his Father: who surrendred unto him his owne wife Stratonica, when he understood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolomie Ceraunus had great cause to seare, that the death of Seleucus would not be unrevenged by this his Successor.

CHAP.5. S.I.

But Aniochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps only with faire words, containing himselfe within Asia; and letting Ceraums enjoy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the bloud of Seleucm. It is said of this Antiochim, than although he married with the Queene Stratonica in his Fathers life, yet out of modestv he forbore to imbrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his inceftuous love was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not prosecuting that revenge; whereunto Nature should have urged him. Afterwards he had wars with Antigonus Gonatas, and with Nicomedes King of Bulynia. Also Lusarius and Leonorius, Kings or Captaines of the Gaules, were fet upon him by the same Nicomedes. With these he fought a great battel: wherein, though otherwise the enemies had all advantage against him, yet by the terrour 10 of his Elephants, which affrighted both their horses and them, he won the Victory .He tooke in hand an enterprise against Prolomie Philadelphin: but finding ill successe in the beginning, he foon gave it over . To this king Antiochin Soter it was, that Berofus the Chaldean dedicated his History of Affria; the same which hath since bin excellently falsified by the Frier Annius. He left behind him one sonne; called Aniochus Theos; and one daughter, called Aname, that was married unto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twentie & ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth yeer of the kingdom of the Greeks, when he had reig-

Antiochus, surnamed Theos, or the god, had this vaine and impious title given to him, by flattery of the Milesians; whom he delivered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. He held long and difficult, but fruitlesse, warre with Ptolomie Philadelphia King of Egypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Prolomie. Of these two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, S. Hierome and other Interpreters have underflood that Prophecie of Daniel: The Kings daughter of the South Shall come to the King of the North to make an agreement; and that which followeth. Prolomie Philadelphus was a great lover of Peace and Learning; and (fetting apart his incestious marriage with his owne fifter Arfinee) avery excellent Prince: howsoever, the worthiest of all that race? Dei Eleazar, then high Priest of the Jewes, for the Bookes of Mofes and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King unto the Jewes had formerly beene very great: for he had fet h Josandara at libertie as many of them, as his Father held in flavery throughout all Egypt; and he had sent unto the * Temple of God in Jerusalem very rich Presents. Wherefore Eleazar, yeelding to the Kings defire, presented him with an Hebrencoppie: which Ptolome caused to be translated into Greek, by seventy two of the most grave and learned persons name of Aifle. that could be found among all the Tribes. In this number of the 72. Interpreters, or (as us; many lear-they are commonly called) the Seventie, Jesisthe some of Syrach, is thought by Genemong the reft brard to have beene one: who that he lived in this Age, it feemes to me very fufficient-40 Lodovicus vives, ly proved by Jansenius, in his Preface unto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this buhold impicion finesse between Philadelphus and the High Priest, was written (as 1 Josephus affirms) by terfeit, and the Arift aus that was employed therein. Fortie yeers Ptolomie Philadelphus was King; reckoning the time wherein he joyntly reigned with his Father. He was exceedingly belothor. Surelyifit ved of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his ehd he grew more voluptuous, than he had beene in his former yeers: in which time he time of Vivesji boaffed, that he alone had found out the way how to live for ever. If this had bin referredunto his honourable deeds, it might have stood with reason: otherwise, the Gowt, nucnmore july suppered with which he was often troubled, was enough to teach him his owne errour. Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at fuch time as he married with Berebooks, wherein nice the daughter of this Ptolomie. After his second marriage, he used his first wife with theyhavechan-no better regard, than if thee had beene his Concubine. Landice hated him for this: yet ged what they adventured not to feeke revenge, untill her owne four Seleucus Callinions was of ability comby Mid- to be king. Justine reports, that Be- Justine 27. renice faved her felfe, together with the yong Prince her childe, a while in the Sanctuary at Daphne: and that not only some Cities of Asa prepared to succour her, but her brother Ptolomy Euergetes, King of Egypt, came to refcue her with an Army; though too late, for the was flaine before. With fuch cruelties Selencus Callinions, fucceeding unto his Father, that had fifteene veares beene King, began his reigne. His subjects were highly offended at his wicked nature; which they discovered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Eflate would have beene much endangered, if Ptolomy Evergetes, who came against him. had not been drawne backe into his owne Countrey, by fome Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would beare armes against Ptolomie, in defence of their owne King: but rather they fided with the Egyptian; who tooke Landice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as the had well deferved. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this invafion, by occasion of those domesticall troubles which recalled Euergetes home into Egypt; went about a dangerous piece of worke, even to make Warre upon his owne subjects, because of their bad affection towards him; when as it had bin much better, by well deferving, to have changed their hatred into love. A great Fleet he prepared: in furnishing and manning whereof he was at such charges, that he scarce left himselfe any other hope, if that should miscarry. Herein he embarqued himselfe; and putting to Sea, did meet with fuch a tempest, as devoured all save himselfe, and a very few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamity, having left him nothing else in a manner than his naked body, turned nevertheleffe to his great good; as anon after it feemed. For when his subjects understood in what fort the gods (as they conceived it) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his Estate: and. prefuming that he would thenceforth become a new man, offered unto him their fervice with great alacritie. This revived him, and filled him with fuch foirit; as thinking himselfe well enough able to deale with the Egyptian, he made ready a mighty Army for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had beene at Sea. Hee was vanquished by Ptolomy in a great battel: whence he escaped hardly: no better at-30 tended, than after his late shipwracke. Hasting therefore backe to Antioch, and fearing that the enemy would foone be at his heeles; He wrote unto his brother Antiochus Hierax, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antio. chus was then but fourteene yeares old, but extremely ambitious; and therefore glad of fuch an occasion to make himselfe great. Hee levied a mighty Army of the Gaules; wherewith he fet forward to help his brother, or rather to get what he could for himfelfe. Hereof Ptolomie being advertifed: and having no defire to put himfelfe in danger more than he needed; tooke Truce with Seleucus for tenne yeares. No fooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Egyptian War, but his brother Antiochus came upon him, and needs would fight with him, as knowing himselfe to have the better Army. So Seleucus vvas vanquished againe; and saved himselfe vvith so few about himsthathe vvas verily supposed to have perished in the battell. Thus dids Gods Justice take revenge of those murders by which the Crowne vvas purchased; and settled (as might have beene thought) on the head of this bloudy King. Antiochus vvas very glad to heare of his brothers death, as if thereby hee had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gaules, his Mercenaries, were gladder than hee. For when he led them against Eumenes King of Pergamus, being in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reigne: these perfidious Barbarians tooke counsell against him, and devised how to ftrippe him of all that he had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royall house to make head against them; it would be in their power, to doe what should be best pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Amiochus; and enforced him to ransome himselse vvith money, as if he had beene their lawfull Prisoner. Neither were they so contented; but made him enter into such Composition with them, as tended but little to his honour. In the meane while Seleucus had gathered a new Armie; and prepared once more to try his fortune against his brother. Exmenes hearing of this, thought the feason sit for himselfe, to make his profit of their discord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which is no great marvell, fince he had great reason to stand inno lesse feare of the Gamer, his own souldiers, than of the enemy with whom he had to deale. After this, Eumenes won much in Asia; whilest Aniochus went against his brother. In the second battell, sought betweene the brethren, Seleucus had the upper hand : and Anisochus Hierax Or the Hawke, (which surname was given him, because he sought his prey upon every one, without care whether he were provoked or not) foared away as farre as he could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gaules. Having fetcht a great compaffe through Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father-in-law King Ariamenes tooke himup. He was entertained very lovingly in outward shew; but with a meaning to betray him. This he foone perceived: and therefore betooke him to his wings againe; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length he resolved to bestow to himselfe upon Prolomy; his owne conscience telling him, what evill he had meant unto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelity can finde no fure harbour. Prolomy well understood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore he laid him up in close prison: whence though by meanes of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, he fell into the hands of theeves, by whom he was murthered. Neere about the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bastrians had rebelled against him, during his wars with his brother. He therefore made a journy against Arfaces founder of the Parthian Kingdome: wherein his evill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered fo closely to him, that he was ta-

Ntiochus was scarcely fifteene years old, when he began his reigne, which lasted fixe and thirty years. In his Minority, He was wholly governed by one Hermias, an ambigious man, and one which maligned all vertue, that he found in any of the Kings faithfull servants. This vile quality in a Counsellor of such great place, how harmfull it was unto his Lord, and finally unto himselfe; the successe of things will shortly

Soon after the beginning of Antiochus his reigne, Ptolomy Euergetes King of Egypt died; and left his heire Ptolomy Philopater, a yong Boy likewife, as hath elsewhere been remembred. This was that Euergetes, who releeved Aratus & the Acheans: who afterwards took part with Chamenes; and lovingly entertained him, when he was chased out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. He annexed unto his Dominion the Kingdome of Cyrene; by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolomies; and the last good king of that race. The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was given to him by the Egyptians; not so much for the great spoyles which he brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that he recovered some of those Images or Idols, which Cambys, when he conquered Egypt, had carried into Persia. He was ready to have made War upon the Jewes, for that Onias their high Priest, out of meer covetousnesse of mony, refufed to pay unto him his yearly tribute of 20 talents: but he was pacified by the wisdome of Josephus a Jew, to whom afterwards he let in farme the Tributes and Customes that belonged unto him in those parts of Syria which he held. For Calofiria, with Palastina, and all those parts of the Country that lay nearest unto Egypt, were held by the Egyptian; either as having fallen to the share of Prolomy the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and flaine in the battell at Ipfus; or as being won by this Euergetes. to in the troublesome and unhappy reigne of Seleucus Callinions. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages between the Prolomies and the Seleucida; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited; which is expounded by S. Hierome. This Ptolomy Euergetes reigned fix and twenty years: and dyed towards the end of the hundred thirty and ninth Olympiad. It may feeme by that which we finde in the Prologue unto Jesus the fon of Syrach his book, that he should have reigned a much longer time. For Siracides there faith that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth yeare, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirty years were the yeares of Jesus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Jewes did other whiles rec-20 kon) from fome notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counsellor, and in a manner the Protector of King Antiochus, incited his Lord unto War against the Egyptian; for the recovery of Calofyria and the Countries adjoyning. This counfell was very unfeafonably given, when Molo, the Kings Lievtenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion, and fought to make himselfeabsolute Lord of that rich Country. Neverthelesse Hermias, being more froward than wife maintained stiffely, that it was most expedient, and agreeable with the Kings honour, to fend forth against a rebellious Captaine, other Captaines that were faithfull; whilest He in person made Warreupon one, that was like himfelfe, a King. No man durst gaine-fay the resolution of Hermias; who therefore sent Xe-30 næras an Achean, with fuch forces ashe thought expedient, against the Rebell; whilest in the meane feafon an Army was preparing for the Kings expedition into Calofyria. The King having marched from Apamea to Laodisea, and fo over the Defarts into the Vally of Massas, between the Mountaines of Libanus and Anti-libanus; found his way there stopped by Theodotus an Atolian, that served under Ptolomy. So he consumed the time there a while to none effect: and then came newes, that Xenætas, his Captain, was deftroyed with his whole Army; and Molothereby become Lord of all the Country, as far as unto Babylon.

Xenætas, whilest he was yet on his journy, and drew neare to the River of Tygris; received many advertisements, by such as fled over unto him from the Enemy, That the followers of Mole were, for the most part, against their wils, drawne by their Commander to beare armes against their King. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himselse stood in some doubt lest his followers would leave him in time of necessity. Xenetas therefore making shew, as if he had prepared to passe the River by Boats in face of his Enemie; left in the night time fuch as he thought meet to defend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Army went over Tygris, in a place tenne miles lower than Molo his Campe. Molo heard of this, and fent forth his horfe to give impediment : but hearing that Xenæras could not fo bee ftopped, Hee himselfe dislodged, and tooke his Journey towards Media; leaving all his baggage behinde him in his Campe. Whether he did this, as diffrusting the faith of his owne souldiers: or whether thereby to deceive so his Enemy; the great folly of Xenatus made his stratagem prosperous. For Xenatus, having borne himselfe proudly before upon the countenance of Hermias, by whom he was advanced unto this charge; did now prefume that all should give way to his authority, without putting him to much trouble of using the sword. Wherefore he suffered his men to feast with the provisions which they found ready in the forfaken Campe: or rather he commanded them to to doe, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish up themselves against the journy, which he intended to take the next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he busied himselfe, in transporting the remainder of his Army, which he had left on the other fide of Tygris. But Mole went no further that day, than he could eafily returne the fame night. Wherefore understanding what good rule the Kings men kept: he made such haste backe unto them, that he came upon them early in the morning; whilest they were yet heavie with the Wine and other good cheare that they had spent at supper. So Xenæts and a very few with him, died fighting in desence of the Campe: the rest were slaughtered without making resided fighting in desence of the Campe: the rest were slaughtered without making resided fighting in desence of the Campe: the rest were slaughtered without making resided fighting in desence of the Campe: the rest were slaughtered without making resided fighting in desence of the other shades and many of them ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Campon the other side of Tygris, was easily taken by Molo: the Captains fly ing thence, to save their own there sleep in this victory, the Rebell marched unto Seleucia, which he presently took: and, mastering within a little while the Province of Babylonia, and all the Country downe to the red-Sca, or Bay of Persia, He hasted unto Susa; where at his first comming, to he won the Citie: but failing to take the Castle that was exceeding strong, returned back to Seleucia, there to give order concerning this businesses.

The report of these things comming to Antiochus, whilest he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Marsyas; filled him with great forrow, and his Campe with trouble. He tooke counsell what to doe in this needfull case; and was well advised by Epigenes, the best man of Warre he had about him, to let alone this enterprise of calosyria; and bend his forces thither, where more need required them. This counfell was put in execution with all convenient hafte. Yet was Epigenes dismissed by the way, and soon after slaine, by the practice of Hermias; who could not endure to heare good counsell given, contrary to his owne good liking and allowance. In the journey against Molo, the name and 20 presence of the King was more availeable, than any oddes which he had of the Rebell in ftrength. Molo diftrufted his owne followers: and thought, that neither his late good furceffe, nor any other confideration, would serve to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience; if once they beheld his person. Wherefore he thought it safeit for him to affaile the Kings Campe in the night time. But going in hand with this, He was discovered by some that fled over from him to the King. This caused him to returne backe to his Campe: which by some errour, tooke alarme at his returne; and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in fight. The King was thus forward in giving battell to Mo-6, upon confidence which he had that many would revolt unto him. Neither was he deceived in this his beliefe. For not a few men, or Enfignes: but all the left wing of the ene-30 my, which was opposite unto the King, changed side forthwith as soon as ever they had fight of the Kings person; and were ready to doe him service against Molo. This was enough to have won the victory : but Mole shortned the work, by killing himselfe; as did also divers of his friends, who for feare of torments, prevented the Hang-man with their

After this Victory came joyfull newes, that the Queene Laodice, daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, which was married unto Antiochus a while before, had brought forth a sonne. Fortune seemed bountifull unto the King: and therefore he purposed to make what use hee could of her friendly disposition while it latted. Being now in the Easterne parts of his Kingdome, He judged it convenient to visit his frontiers, were it 46 only to terrefie the Barbarians, that bordered upon him. Hereunto his Counfellor Hermias gave affent: not formuch respecting the Kings honour, as considering what good might thereby happen to himselfe. For if it should come to passe, that the Kingwere taken out of the world by any casualty: then made he no doubt of becomming Prote-Aor to the yong Prince; and thereby of lengthening his owne Government. Antiochus therefore went against Artaba anes, who reigned among the Atropations; having the greatest part of his kingdome situate betweene the Caspian and Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and fearefull; and therefore yeelded unto what foever conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay upon him. So in this journey Antiochus got honour, such as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Upon the way, a Physician of 50 his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truely how odious he was to the people; and how dangerous he would be shortly unto the Kings owne life. Antiechus beleeved this as having long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring for fear of him toutter his suspicions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the fudden: which was done, he being trained forth by a fleight, a good way out of the Campe, and there killed without warning or disputation. The King needed not to have used so much art in ridding his hands of a man so much detested. For how soever he seemed gracious whilest he was alive: yet they that for feare had beene most obsequious to him, whileft he was in case to doe them hurt, vvas as ready as the foremost, to speake of him as he had deserved, when once they were secure of him: Yea, his wife and children, lying then at Apamea, were stoned to death by the vvives and children of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outrageously, the longer that it had beene concealed.

About these times, Acham (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of these expeditions which hee tooke in hand; was bold to see a Diademe upon his owne head, and take upon him as a King. His purpose was to have invaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quie to the enterprise; and studie to set some handsome colour on his sormer presumption. It is very strange, that Antiochus neither went against Achaus; nor yet dissembled the notice which he had taken of these his traiterous purposes: but wrote unto him, signifying that he knewall, and upbraiding him with fuch infidelity, as any offender might know to be unpardonable. By these meanes he emboldned the Traytor : who being already detected, might better hope to maintaine his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement defire to recover Calofyria, or what elfe hee could, of the Dominions of Piolomie Philopater in those parts. He began with Seleucia, a very strong Citie neare to the mouth of the River Orontes; which ere long he wonne, partly by force, partly by corrupting 20 with bribes the Captaines that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the Great, who founded it, gave the name of Antigonia: but Selencus getting it shortly after, called it Selencia; and Ptolomy Energetes having lately wonne it, might if it had fo pleased him, have changed the name into Ptolemais. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an endlesse memoriall unto their names, by workes proceeding rather from their greatnesse, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their owne. than the fame greatnesse hath continuance. Theodotus the Ætolian, he that before had opposed himselfe to Antiochus, and defended Calosyria in the behalfe of Piolomy; was now growen forry, that he had used so much faith & diligence, in service of an unthankful and luxurious Prince. Wherefore as a Mercenary, he began to have regard to his owne 30 profit: which thinking to finde greater, by applying himfelfe unto him that was (queftionleffe) the more worthy of these two Kings; He offered to deliver up unto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrus and Ptolemais. Whilest he was devising about this treason, and had already fent messengers to king Antiochus: his practice was detected, and he besieged in Ptolemais by one of Ptolomies Captaines, that was more faithfull than himselfe. But Antiochus hasting to his rescue, vanquished this Captaine who met him on the way : and afterwards got possession, not onely of Tyrus and Ptolemais, with a good Fleet of the Egyptian Kings that was in those Havens: but of so many other Townes in that Countrie, as emboldned him to thinke upon making a journey into Egypt it selfe. Agai thocles and Sofibius bore all the fway in Egypt at that time: Ptolomie himselfe being loth to have his pleasures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the safety of his Kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make provision as hastily, and yet as fecretly as might be, for the Warre: and nevertheleffe, at the same time, to presse Antiochus with daily Embassadors to some good agreement. There came in the heate of this businesse. Embassadors from Rhodes, By antium, and Cy Zicus, as likewise from the Ætolians; according to the usuall courtesie of the Greeks, desiring to take up the quarrell.

These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocks and Sosibini: who intreated them to deale effectually with Antiochus. But whilest this treaty lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the Warre: wherein these two Counselfors perswaded to themselves reasonably, that the victory would be their own; if they could get, for mony, a sufficient number of the Greeks to take their parts. Antiochus heard only what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Governours of Egypt were to be at quiet: whereuntohe gave the readier besiefe, not onely for that he knew the disposition of Piolomie, but because the Rhodians, and other Embassadors, comming from Memphis, discoursed unto him all after one maner; as being all deceived by the cunning of Agathocks and his sellow: Antiochus therefore having wearied himselfe, at the long siege of a Town called Dura, which he could not win: and being desirous to refresh himselfe and his Army in Seleccia, during the winter which then came on, granted to the Egyptian a Truce for some

moneths, with promife that he would be ready to hearken unto equal Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as he would faine have feemed, but onely to lull his enemies afleepe, whilest he took time to refresh himselse; and to bring Achaus to some good order, whose treason daily grew more open and violent. The fame negligence which he thought the Egyptian would have used, He used himselse; as presuming, that when time of the year better served, little force would be needfull; for that the Townes would voluntarily yeeld unto him, fince Ptolomie provided not for their defence. Neverthelesse, he gave audience to the Embassadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Egypt: pleasing himselse well, to dispute about the justice of his quarrell; which he purposed shortly to make good by 10 the fword, whether it were just or no. He faid, that it was agreed between Seleucus his Ancestor, and Ptolomie the sonne of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could winne it from Antigonus, should be given in possession to Seleucus: and that this bargaine was afterwards ratified, by generall consent of all the Confederates, after the battell at Ipsus. But Ptolomies men would acknowledge no fuch bargaine. They faid that Ptolomie the fonne of Lagi, had wonne Caloffria, and the Provinces adjoyning, for himfelfe: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleueus, by lending him forces to recover his Province of Babylon, and the Countries about the River of Euphrases. Thus whilest neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were in the end of their disputation, as farre from concluding, as at the beginning. Ptolomie demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that 20 he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Also Ptolomy would needs have Achaus comprehended in the League betweene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming against it as a shamefull thing, that one King should offer to deale so with another, as totake his Rebell into protection, and feek to joyn him in Confederacy with his owne Soveraigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field againe: contrary to his expectation, he was informed, That Prolomy, with a very puissant Army, was comming up against him out of Egipt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountred on the way by those Captaines of Ptolomy, that had resisted him the yeare before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence neverthelesse he drave them: and 30 proceeding onward in his journey, wonne fo many places, that he greatly encreafed his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with divers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew neare together: many Captaines of Prolomy forfook his pay, and fled over to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Egyptian had the courage to meet his enemy in the field. The battell was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Egyptians or Assatiques were the better Souldiers (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greekes, Thracians, and Gaules) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Prolomy, with Arsinoe his Sister and Wife, rode up and downe encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other fide: each of them rehearling the brave deeds of his Ancestors; 40 as not having of their owne, whereby to value themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants, as also his, being of Asia, had they been fewer, would have beaten those of Africke. Wherefore by the advantage of those beasts, He drave the Enemies before him, in that part of the battell wherein he fought himselfe. But Prolomy had the better men: by whose valour he brake the Grosse of his Enemies battell, and won the victory; whilest Antiochus was heedlessly following upon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field above seventy thousand foot, and fixe thousand horse; whereof though he lost scarce ten thousand foot, and not foure hundred horse; yet the fame of his overthrow took from him all those places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch . He began to stand in seare, lest Pto- 50 lomie and Ashaus, ferting upon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors to the Egyptian, to treate of peace; which was readily granted; it being much against the nature of Ptolomy to vexe himselfe thus with the tedious businesse of Warre. So Ptolomy having staied three moneths in Syria, returned home into Egypt, clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his subjects, and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and sloth-

Acham was not comprised in the league betweene these two Kings: or if hee had beene included therein; yet would not the Egyptian have taken the paines, of making a fecond expedition for his fake. The best was, that he thought himselfe strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was he confident without great reason: for befides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged unto Antioches on this fide of Taures, he had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither was he, as Molo the Rebell had beene, one of meane regard otherwise, and carried beyond himselfe by apprehending the vantage of some opportunitie: but Confin-german to the King, as hath beene shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a younger daughter of the same Mubridates King of 10 Pontus, which was also called Landice, as was her fifter the Queene, Antiochus his wife. These things had added majestie unto him, and had made his followers greatly to respect him, even as one to whom a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolomie of Egypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battellat Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelihoods came to nothing: for the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarrell betweene fonnes-in-law, had no reason to take part against the more honourable. As for the Egyptian, he was not onely flothfull, but hindred by a rebellion of his owne subjects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Egypt, of whom Ptolomie, contrary to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serve in the late expedition; beganne to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferiour to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: fince they less efteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings mercenarie Greekes; which had hitherto kept them in streight subjection. Thus brake out a warre betweene the King and his fubjects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolomie thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might have beene spent, as he thought, much better in revelling; or, as others thought, in succouring Achem. As for Antiochm, He had no fooner made his peace with the Egypti-10 an, than he turned all his care to the preparation of war against Acheus. To this purpose he entred into League with Attalus; that so he might distract the forces of his Rebell, and finde him worke on all fides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were fuch, that within a while he had pent up Acheus into the Citie of Sardes; where he held him about two veeres befieged. The Citie was very ftrong, and wellvictualled: fo as there appeared not, when the second yeere came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the first yeeres siege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found meanes how to enter the Towne. The Castle it selfe was upon a very high Rocke, and in a manner impregnable: as also the Towne-wall adjoyning to the Castle, in that part which was called the Same. was in like manner fituate upon fleepe Rockes, and almost inaccessible; that hung over a deepe bottome, whereinto the dead carkafes of Horfes, and other beafts, yea, and sometimes of men, used to be thrown. Now it was observed by Lagoras, that the Ravens and other birds of prey, which haunted that place by reason of their food which was there never wanting, used to flie up unto the top of the Rocks, and to pitch upon the walls. where they rested without any disturbance. Observing this often he reasoned with himfelfe, and concluded, that those parts of the Wall were left unguarded, as being thought unapprochable. Hereof he informed the king: who approved his judgment, and gave unto him the leading of fuch men, as he defired for the accomplishing of the enterprise. The fuccesse was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceived and though with much labour, yet without refiftance, he scaled those rocks, and (whilest a generall affault was made) entred the towne in that part, which was at other times unguarded, then unthought upon. In the fame place had the Persians, under Cyrus, gotten into Sardes: when Crafus thought himselfe secure on that side. But the Citizens tooke not warning by the example of a losse many ages past: and therefore our of memorie. Achaus held Itill the Caftle: which not onely feemed by nature impregnable, but was very well ftored with all necessaries, and manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well affured. Anisochus therefore was constrayned to waste much time about it : having none other hope to prevaile, than by famishing the inclosed. Besides the usual tediousnesses of expectation, his businesse called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Ba-

Erians, and Parthians with the Hyrcanians, had erected kingdomes taken out of his Dominions, upon which they still incroached. But he thought it not fafe, to let Achaem breake loofe againe. On the other fide there were fome Agents of Prolomie the Egyptaan, and good friends unto Acheus; that made it their whole studie, how to deliver this besieged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more: but presumed that when he should appeare in the Countreyes under Taurm, he would soone have an Armie at command, and be firong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to worke as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the wayes in the Countrey, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult paffages among those Rockes, whereon the Castle of Sardes stood. Him 10 they tempted with great rewards, which he should receive at the hands of Piolomie, as well as of Acheus; to doe his best for performance of their desire. He undertook the bufinesse: and gave such likely reasons of bringing all to good effect, that they wrote unto Acheus, by one Arianus, a trustie messenger, whom Bolu found meanes to conveigh into the Caftle. The faith of these Negotiators Achem held most affured. They also wrote unto him in privie Characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none fave he and they were acquainted: whereby he knew, that it was no fained device of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As forthe messenger, he was a trustie fellow, and one whom Achaus found, by examination, heartily affected unto their fide. But the Contents of the Epiftle, which were, That he should be consident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus 20 whom Bolis had wonne unto the businesse, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him unknowne : and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; under whom he had the Among these command of those Cretans, which held one of the Fortsthat blocked up the Castle of Sardes. Neverthelesse other way to escape he saw none, than by putting himself to some ealling himself adventure. When the messenger had therefore passed often to and fro, it was at length concluded, That Bolis himselfe should come speak with Achem, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the rest, fave onely by Bolis and Cambylus; which were Cretans, and (as all their Countrimen, * some sew excepted, have beene, and still are) false knaves. These two held a consultation together, that was, as * Polybins observes it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the safety of him whose de-30 liverance they undertooke, nor touching the discharge of their own faith; but only how toget most with least adoe and danger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That first of all they would equally share betweenethem ten Talents, which they had already received in hand: and then, That they would reveale the matter to Aniochus; offering to could dean the deliver Acheus unto him, if they might be well rewarded both with present money, and with promise of consideration answerable to the greatnesse of such a service, when it nanetwice be. should be dispatched. Anisochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no lesse glad, lied me; in cal. than were the friends of Achem well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolis. At length when all things were in readinesse on both sides, and that Bolis with Arianus that have been was to get up into the Castle, and conveigh Acham thence: He first went with Camby-40 lus to speake with the King, who gave him very private audience; and confirmed unto raigne. It is an him by word of mouth the affurance of his liberall promifes. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithfull unto Ptolomie, whom he had long served, he accompanied Arianus up into the Castle. At his comming this ther, hee was lovingly entertained; yet questioned at large by Acheus, touching all the weight of the businesse in hand. But he discoursed so well, and with such gravity; that there appeared no reason of distrusting either his faith or judgement. Hee was an old Souldier, had long beene a Captaine under Ptolomie, and did not thrust the commendate himselfe into this businesse; but was invited by honourable and faithfull men. Hee had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other Countriman of his, 50 who kept a Fort that flood in their way; and thereby had already fundry times githan he in mul- ven fafe paffage and repaffage unto Arianus. But against all these comfortable hopes, riplicity or rame is beyond the importance of so great an adventure stirred up some distidence. Acham thereanythe Cretians fore dealt wisely, and sayd, That he would yet stay in the Castle a little longer : but that hee meant to fend away with Bolis three or foure of his friends; from whom when hee received better advertisement, concerning the likelihood of the enterprise, then would he iffue forth himselfe. Hereby he took order, not to commit himself wholnow belies. a ered bifus. Iy unto the faith of a man unknowne. But as Polybins well notes, he did not confider that he playd the Crevan with a man of Creve: which is to fay, That he had to doe with one, whose knavery could not be avoided by circumspection. Bolis and Cambilus had layd their plots thus, That if Achem came forthalone, then should he easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arianus be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had trodden it oft; and Bolis following behinde, should have an eye upon Achaem to prevent him, not onely from escaping in the tumult, but from breaking his owne necke, or otherwise killing himselfe: to the end that being taken alive, he might be to Antiochus the more welcome Present. And in such order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide; the rest fol-10 lowing, as the way ferved, and Bolis in the Rere. Achers made none acquainted with his purpose, till the very instant of his departure. Then fignified he the matter to his Wife Laodice; and comforting her with hopeas well as he could, appointed foure of his fpecial friends to beare him companie. They were all disguised: and one of them alone tooke upon him to have knowledge of the Greek tongue; speaking and answering as need should require for all, as if the rest had beene Barbarians. Bolis followed them, crastily devising upon his businesse, and much perplexed. For (faith Polybius) Though he were of Crete, and prone to surmife any thing to the mischiefe of another; yet could be not see in the darke, nor know which of them was Acham, or whether Acham himselfe were there. The way was very uneafie, and in fome places dangerous; especially to those that knew 20 it not. Wherefore they were faine to stay in divers places, and helpe one another up or downe. But upon every occasion they were all of them very officious towards Achaeus; lending him their hands, and taking fuch care of him, as eafily gave Bolis to understand, that he was the man: and so by their unseasonable duty, they undid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in wait, Bolis whifteled, and prefently clasped Ach aus about the middle, holding him fast that he could not stirre. So they were all taken by the Ambush, and carried forthwith to Antiochus; who sate up watching in his Pavilion, expecting the event. The fight of Acham, brought in bound unto him, did for aftonish the king, that he was unable to speake a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was he before informed of the plot, which might have kept him from admiration: as 30 also the next morning betimes, affembling his friends together, he condemned Achaeu to a cruell death: which argues, that he was not moved with pity towards this unhappy man. Wherefore it was the generall regard of calamities, incident unto great fortunes, that wrung from him thefeteares: as also the rarity of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it be so, that such a course as this of his in employing two mischievous knaves against one Traitor, doth not rarely succeed well; according to that Spanish Proverb, A un traydor dos allevosos. The death of Achaus brought such astonishment upon those which held the castle, that after a while they gave up the place & themfelves unto the King; whereby he got entire possession of all to him belonging in the leffer Alia.

Some yeeres passed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his expedition against the Parthians and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings, and commonly fubject unto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Provinces, after the death of Alexander, the Government over them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard: shortly they fell to Eumenes; then to Anigonm: and from him, together with the Medes, to Selenem; under whose posterity they continued untill the Reigne of Seleucus Callinicus, being ruled by Lievtenants of the Syrian Kings. The luftfull infolencie of one of these Lievtenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus; that was vanquished and thought to be slain by the Gaules; did stirre up Arfaces, a Noble man of the Countrey, to seeke revenge of injuries done, and o animate them to rebell. So he flue the Kings Lievtenant; made himfelfe King of the Parihians, and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings; and tooke Seleucus Callinious prisoner in battell, whom hee royally entertained and difmiffed. Hereby he wonne reputation as a lawfull King : and by good government of his Country, procured unto himselfe such love of his Subjects, that his name was continued unto his fucceffours; like as that of the Ptolomies in Egypt, and that of the Cafars afterwards in Rome. Much about the same time the Badrians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging unto the Seleucida beyond Euphrates, increafed the Parthians dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an army, that they durst not meet him in plaine field; but kept themselves in woods, or places of ftrength, and defended the Streights and paffages of mountaines. The refiftances they made availed them not. For Anisochus had with him fo great a multitude, and fo well forted, as he needed not to turne out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods and Streights between their mountains; it being easie to spare out of so great a number, as many as fetching a compasse about, might either get above the enemies heads; or come behinde, and charge them on the backe. Thus did hee often imploy against them his light armature: wherewith he caused them to dislodge, and give way unto his Phalanx 5 upon which they durst not adventure themselves in open ground Arfaces, the second of the name, (for his father was dead before this) was then King of 10 Parthia: who though he was confident in the fidelity of his owne subjects; yet seared to encounter with fo mighty an Invader. His hope was, that the bad wayes and Defarts would have caused Antiochus, when he was at Echatane in Media, to give over the journey, without proceeding much further. This not so falling out : Hee caused the Wells and Springs in the Wildernesse, through which his Enemy must passe, to bee dammed up and spoyled. By which meanes, and the resistance before spoken of, when he could not prevaile, He withdrew himselfe out of the way; suffering the Enemy to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Countrey: wherein without some victory obtained, hee could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Arfaces was nothing strongly provided for the War. Wherefore he marched through the heart of 20 Parthia : and then forward into Hyrcania where he wanne Tambrace, the chiefe City of that Province. This indignity, and many other losses, caused Arfaces at length, when he had gathered an Army that seemed strong enough, to adventure a battell. The issue thereof was such as gave to neither of the Kings hope of accomplishing his defires, without exceeding difficulty . Wherefore Arfaces craved peace, and at length obtain ned it: Antiochus thinking it not amisse, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a

The next expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Battrians; one that indeed had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors: but having gottenthe Kingdome from those that had rebelled, kept it himselfe. With Euthydemus hee fought a 30 battell by the River Arius, where he had the victory. But the victory was not fo greatly to his honour, as was the testimony which he gave of his owne private valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to have demeaned him more courageoufly, thandid any one man in all his Army. His horse was slaine under him; and he himselse received a wound in his mouth, whereby he lost some of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, He withdrew himselfe back unto the furthermost parts of his Kingdome, and afterwards protracted the War, seeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadors passed betweene the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrey of his was unjuftly usurped from him: Euthydemus answering, That he had won it from the children of the Usurpers : and further, That the Bactrians, a wilde Nation, could hardly be retained in order, fave by a 40 King of their owne; for that they bordered upon the Scythians, with whom if they should joyne, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behinde them. These allegations, together with his owne wearinesse, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, upon reasonable Conditions. Demetrias, the son of Enthydemus, being a goodly gentleman, and employed by his father, as Embassador in this Treaty of Peace, was not a little availeable unto a good conclusion: for Antiochus liked him so well, that he promised to give him in marriage, one of his owne daughters; and therewithall permitted Euthydemus to retaine the Kingdome, causing him neverthelesse to deliver up all his Elephants; as also to bind himselfe by oath, to such Covenants as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus leaving the Baitrian in quiet, made a journey over Caucasus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophagasenus, King of the Indians, the society that had been between their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subject unto the Macedonians for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his Warreagainst Antigonus, raised part of his forces out of their Countrey. But when Antigonus (after his victory) turned Westward, and was over-busied in a great civill Warrethen did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, stirre up his Country-men to rebellion; making himselse their Captaine, and taking upon him, as protector of their liberty. This Office and Title he foonechanged, though not without fome contention, into the Name and Majestie of a King. Finally he got unto himselfe (having an Army of fixe hundred thousand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had bin Alexanders. In this estate he had well confirmed himself ereseleucus Nicator could find leifure to call him to account Neither did he faint, or humble himself at the comming of Seleucus: but met him in the field, as ready to defend his owne, fo strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented to make both peace and affinity with him, taking only a reward of fifty Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian kingdomes, was continued by fome Offices of love between their children, and now renewed by Antioto chus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon, by the Indian king to an hundred and fiftie: as also he was promised, to have some treasure sent after him; which he left one to receive. Thus parted these two great kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards in many generatios, any business worthy of remembrance with the western Countries. The posteritie of Sandrocours is thought to have retained that kingdome unto the dayes of Augustus Casar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, fent Embassadors with prefents, and an Epiftle written in Greek, wherein, among other things, He faid, That he had command over fixe hundred kings. There is also found, scattered in fundrie Authors, the mention of fome which held that kingdome, in divers Ages, even unto the time of Constantine the Great: being all peradventure of the same race. But Antiochus: 20 who in this Treatie with Sophagasenus carried himselfe as the worthier person, receiving Presents; and after marching home through Drangiana and Carmania, with such reputation, that all the Potentates, not only in the higher Afra, but on the hither fide of Taurus, humbled themselves unto him, & called him The Greats aw an end of his own greatneste within few yeeres ensuing, by presuming to stand upon points with the Romans; whose Greatnesse was the same indeed, that his was only in feeming.

6. III.

The lewdreign of Ptolomic Philopater in Egypt: with the tragical end of his favorites, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to war on the young childe Ptolomic Epiphanes, the son of Philopater. His irresolution in preparing for divers wars at once. His voyage towards the Hellespont. He seeks to hold amitte with the Romans, who make friendly shew to him; intending neverthelesse to have war with him. His doings against the Hellespont; which the Romans made the strict ground of their quarrell to him.

His expedition being finished , Antiochus had leifure to repose himselfe a while; and studie which way to convert the terrour of his puissance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three years Ptolomie Philopater died: leaving his fon Prolomie Epiphanes, a young Boy, his successor in the kingdome; unlikely by him to be well defended against a neighbour so mighty and ambitious. This Prolemic surnamed Philopater, that is to fay, a lover of his Father, is thought to have had that furname given him in meere derifion; as having made away both his Father and Mother. His young yeeres being newly past, his childhood when he began to reigne, may seeme to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death : yet the beastlinesse of all his following life, makes him nor unlike to have done any mischiese, whereof hee could be accused. Having won the battell at Raphiah, He gave himselfe over to sensuality; and was wholly governed by a Strumper called Againoclea. At her infligation Hee murdered his owne wife and fifter; which had adventured her felfe with him, in that onely dangerous Action by him undertaken and performed with honour. The Lievtenantso ships of his Provinces, with all Commands in his Armie, and Offices what foever, were wholly referred unto the disposition of this Againoclea, and her brother Againocles, and Oenanthe a filthy Bawd that was mother unto them both. So these three governed the Realme at their pleasure, to the great griefe of all the Countrey, till Philapater died who having reigned seventeene yeeres, lest none other sonne than Prolomie Epiphanes a childe of five yeers old begotten on Arlinoe that was his fifter and wife. After the Kings death, Agihancles began to take upon him, as Protector of young Epiphanes, and Governor of the Land. He affembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinary forces in pay, not all borne in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Egypt with Ptolomie the first and would not be accounted Egyptians; as neither would the Kings themselves) and bringing forthuntothem his fifter Agathoclea, with the young King in her armes; began a solemne oration. He told them, That the deceased father of this their King, had committed the childe into the armes of his fifter, but unto the faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the kingdome did now relye. He befought them therefore that they would be faithfull, and, as great need was, defend their King against the treason of one Tlepolemu, an ambitious man; who traiterously went about to set the Diademe upon his owne head, being a meere stranger to the Royall bloud. Herewithall he produced before them a witnesse, that should justifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he delivered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, 10 and counterfeiting teares: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake; but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shamelesse di ssembler he was, to take so much upon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so brake up the Assembly: he that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathocles therefore, whom the old Kings favour had made mighty, but neither wife nor well qualified, thought to goe to worke, as had formerly been his manner, by using his authority, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. He haled out of a Temple the mother-in-law of Tlepolemus; and cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumors, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilest they were committed in the old kings name) to meet in knots together, and utter one to another their mindes; where-20 in they had conceived extreme hate, against these three pernicious Mis-governours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present injurie done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also moved with seare of harme; which, in way of requitall, Tlepolemus was likely to doe unto the Citie. For he was, though a man most unapt for Government, as afterwards he proved, yet no bad Souldier, and well beloved of the Armie. It was also then in his power, to stop the provision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motives wrought with the people, so by the remedy which Agathocles used, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred unto uproare. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom he suspected of conspiracie against him; & delivered him unto a follower of his own, to be examined by torture. This 30 poore Souldier was carried into an inner roome of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his apparell to be tormented. But whilest the whippes were brought forth, and all thnigs even in a readinesse for that purpose, there was brought unto the minister of Agathocles, a fad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the roome; leaving Moeragenes the Souldier alone by himselfe, and the doors open. He perceiving this, naked as he was, conveighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got unto the Macedonians; of whom he found some in a Temple there by at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priviledges, as are the Turkes Janizars. Being affured therefore that one of their fellowes had thus beene used, they fell to Armes in a great rage, and began to force the Palace: 40 crying out, That they would see the King, and not leave him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citie, with lowd clamours, made no lesse adoe than the Souldiers, though to leffe effect. So the old Bawd Oenanthe fled into a Temple: her Sonne and Daughter stayed in the Court, untill the King was taken from them; and they, by his permission which he easily gave, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, delivered up to the furie of the people. Agathocles himfelse was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His fifter was dragged naked up and downe the streets; as was also his mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed upon them a barbarous execution of justice; biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in 50

These troubles in Egypt, served well to stir up King Antiochus; who had very good leafure, though he vvanted all pretence, to make vvarre upon young Ptolomie. Philip of Macedon had the same defire to get what part he could of the childes estate. But it happened vvell, that Prolomie Philopater in the Punicke Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices unto the Romans. Unto them therefore the Egyptians addressed themselves, and craved helpe against these two kings: who though they secretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into covenant to divide betweene them all that belonged unto this Orphan; whose Father had beene Confederate with them both. So * M. Lepidus was fent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of * Jul. 116.30. Egypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian; He was very soone found buffed, with war at his owne doores. Also Scopus the Liolian, being a Penfioner to the Egyptian, was fent into Greece to raife an Armie of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I doe not finde: and therefore thinke it not improbable, that he was fent thither only one of the three Embassadors, o in the beginning of the Warre with Philip, as hath otiv. His 31. beene shewed before. As for Scopas; He shortly after went up into Syria with his Army: where winning many places among the rest of his Acts, he subdued the Tenes; who feeme to have yeelded themselves a little before unto Antiochus, at such time as they saw him prepare for his War, & despaired of receiving helpe from Egypt. But it was not long, Vide Togeth. Antiere all these victories of Scopus came to nothing. For the very next yeere following. which was (according to Eulebius) the fame yeer that Philip was beaten at Cynoscephalæ; Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battaile, and recovered all that had bin lost. Among the rest, the Temes with great willingnesse returned under his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated. The Land of Egypt this great King did forbeare to invade; and gave it out, that he meant to bestow a daughter of his owne in marriage unto Piolomy; either hoping, as may feem, that the Country would willingly fubmit it felfe unto him, if this yong child should happen to miscarry; or else that greater purchase might bemade in the Westerne parts of Afia, whilest Philip was held over-laboured by the Romans. It appeares that he was very much distracted; hunting (as we fay) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels betweene Attalus, Philip, and the Greeks, promifed to affoord him great advantage, if he should bring his Army to the Hellespont. On the other side, the state of Egypt being fuch as hath beene declared, feemed eafily to bee swallowed up at once. One while therefore he tooke what he could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Tewes among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Egyptian) to yeeld him obedience. Another while, letting Egypt alone, He was about to make invafion upon Attalus his Kingdome; yet suffered himselfe easily to bee perswaded by the Roman 30 Embaffadours, and defifted from that enterprise. Having thus farre gratified the Romans; He fends Embaffadours to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amity betweene him and them. It is not lightly to be overpassed, That these his Embassadours were lovingly entertained at Rome; and difmiffed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answer of the Komans was not fincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their owne intent. They had not yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly bee troubled with two great wars at once. Wherfore, not standing much upon the nice examination of what belonged unto their honour, they were content to give good words for the present. In the meane time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria, and shortly prepares to winne fome Towns elfewhere, belonging unto Ptolomy; yet withall he fends an Army Westward intending to make what profit he can of the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is confiderable, as an argument of his much irrefolution, How notwithstanding his attempts upon both of their Kingdomes, he offered one of his daughters to Piolomy, and another to Eumenes the fon of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: feeking each of their friendships, at one and the same time, when he sought to make each of them a spoile. Thus was he acting and deliberating at once; being carried with an inexplicable defire of repugnancies, which is a difease of great, and over-swelling fortunes. Howsoever it was, He fent an Army to Sardes by Land, under two of his fonnes: willing them there to ftay for him; whilest he himselfe with a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other o veffels, intended to passe along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as held for the Egyptian. It was a notable Act of the Khodians, that, whilft the warre of Philip lay yet upon their hands, they adventured upon this great Antiochus. They fent unto him a proud Embassage: whereby they gave him to understand, That if he passed forward beyond a certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meet him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs unto him; but because he should not joyne with Philip their enemy, and helpe him against the Romans. It was infolently done of them, neither feemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits unto the King: yet he tempered himselfe, and without any shew of indignation gave a gentle answer; partly himselfe to their Embas-Ppppp fadours; fadours; partly unto their whole city, by Embaffadors which he thither fent. He shewed his desire to renew the ancient Confederacies between his Ancestors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, lest his comming should tend unto any hurt, either of them, or of their confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his very good friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proofe, than the entertainement and answer by them newly given to his Embassadors.

The Rhodians appeare to have been a cunning people, and fuch as could foresee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what had pasfed between his Embaffadours and the Senate, moved them not a whit; when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian warre was ended at the battaile of Cynoscephala. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to sit still; unlesse the Townes on the South Coast of Asia, belonging to Ptolomy their friend and Confederate, were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well; for that they had ever beene greatly beholding to all the race of the Prolomies. They therefore, in this time of necesfity, gave what aide they could unto all the subjects of the Egyptian in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the sonne of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the war that followed, betweene Aniochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to beltow one of his daughters upon him in marriage: He excused himself. and would not have her. Attalus and Philetarus, his brethren, wondred at this. But he 20 told them , that the Romans would furely make war upon Antiochus; and therein finally prevaile. Wherefore he faid, That by abstaining from this affinitie, it should be in his power to joyne with the Romans, and strengthen himselfe greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if he leaned to Antiochus: as he must be partaker in his overthrow; so was he fure to be oppressed by him, as by an over-mighty neighbour, if he happened to win the victory.

Antiochus himselfe wintered about Ephesus: where he took such order as he thought convenient, for the reducing of Smyrna and Lampfacus to obedience; that had usurped their liberty, and obstinately strove to maintaine it, in hope that the Romans would proteet them. In the beginning of the Spring he failed unto the Hellespont: where having 30 won some Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, he passed over into Europe fide; and in fhort space mastered the Chersonesw. Thence went he to Lysimachia: which the Thracians had gotten & destroied, when Philip withdrew his garrison thence, to imploy it in the Roman war. The Ætolians objected as a crime unto Philip, in the conference before T. Quintius, that he had oppressed Lysimachia, by thrusting thereinto a garrison. Hereupon Phalap made answer, that his garrison did not oppresse the town but fave it from the Barbarians . who tooke and fackt it, as soone as the Macedonians were gone. That this answer was good & substantiall, though it were not acceptable as such; might appeare by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lysimachia at his comming thither. For the town was utterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people carried away into flavery. Wherefore the Kingtooke order to have it re-edified: as also to redeeme those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were disperfed in the Country thereabout. Likewise he was carefull to allure thither, by hopefull promifes, new inhabitants, and to replenish the Citie with the wonted frequencie. Now to the end that men should not be terrefied from comming thither to dwell, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians: he tooke a journey in hand against those barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Army; leaving the other halfe to repair the City. These paines he tooke; partly in regard of the convenient fituation, & former glory of Lysimachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding unto his owne honour, to recover and establish the dominion in those parts which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won 50 from Lyfimachus, and thereby made his Kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he shall dearely pay : and as after that victory against Lysimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadly wound of the Kingdome founded by Seleucus ensue very speedily, after the reconquest of the fame Countrie, which was the last of Seleucus his purchases.

§. IIII.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their warre with Philip: after which they quarrell with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chassed by his enemies, and by the Romans: His slight unto the King Antiochus. The Etolians murmure against the Romans in Greece. The warre of the Romans and Acheans, with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece.
T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace denied to Antiochus by the Romans.

Or the Romans, though they were unable to fmother their defire of warre with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keepe the rumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended warre, so long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprise of the Kings about Lyfimathia. It was not long, fince King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their warre with Philip, could obtaine of them none other helpe against Antiochus, than Embaffadors to speake for him; because the one of these Kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards passe between them any other offices, than very friendly . Antiochus at the request of their Embassadours, withdrew his Invasion from the 20 Kingdom of Pergamus: also very shortly after he sent Embassadors to them, to make a perfect League of amitie between them. This was whileft as yet they were bufied with Philip, and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptation: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients unto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed into termes of worse, but more plaine meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counfailors sent from Rome, required (as hath bin * shewed chap. 4. S. ult. before) with a commination of war, this Kings gratulation of their victory; as also his long-professed amitie, and defire to continue in the same.

These ten Counsailors were able to informe T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the 30 purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seemes that he was not ignorant before, since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable unto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they divided themselves to make progresse through divers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion served, use diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome unmindfull of the businesse: wherein lest T. Quintius, with his ten Affiftants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging ; L. Cornelius was fent from Rome, of purpose to deale with the King about those controversies, that were betweene him and Ptolomy. What other private instructions Cornelius had; we may conjecture by the mannaging of this his Embassage. For com-40 ming to Selymbria: and there understanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, having bin fent by Titus, were at Lysimachia, He hastened thither; whither also came P. Lemulus (another of the ten Counfailors) from Bargilla, to be present at the Conference. Hegelianax and Lysias were also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptorie Conditions, which the Embassadours present shall expound unto their Master. After a few daies Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The mecting and entertainement betweene him and these Romans, was in appearance full of love. But when they came to treat of the businesse in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly delivered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reasonto deliver backe unto Piolomy those Townes of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Hereunto hee added, and that very earnestly, That he must also give up the Townes of late belonging unto Philip; and by him news ly occupied. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the Romans, as to let Anziochus enjoy the profit of that warre, wherein they had laboured fo much, and he done nothing? Further he warned the King, that he should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally he demanded of him, upon what reason he was come over with so great an Armie into Europe; for that other cause of his journey there was none probable, than a purpose to make warre upon the Romans? To this the King made answer, That hee wondred why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking Ppppp 2 upon the matters of Asia: wherewith hee prayed them to let him alone; even as hee. without such curiosity, suffered them to doe in Italy what they thought good. As for his comming over into Europe: they saw well enough what businesse had drawne him thither; namely, the warre against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recovery of Townes to him belonging, in Thrace, & Cherlone fus. Now concerning his title unto that countrie, He derived it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victory against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controversie betweene him and the other Kings, had beene still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians; but had beene feized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at fuch time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countries, were hindred by multiplicitie of businesse, from looking unto all that was their owne. Finally he willed them neither to stand in fear of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lysimachia; since it was his purpose to bestow this citie upon one of his sons, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Asia; either against the free cities, or against the King of Egypt; fince it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding unto himselfe, and to joyne ere long with Ptolomy, not onely in friendship, but in a bond of neere affinitie. Cornelius having heard this, and being perhaps unableto refute it; would needs heare further, what the Embassadours of Smyrna and of Lampfacm, whom he had there with him, could fay for themselves. The Embassadours of Lampfacus being called in, began a tale; wherein they feemed to accuse the King be-20 fore the Romans, as it were before competent Judges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace, forasmuch as hee had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betweene him and them. Thus the Treatie held some few daies, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, having not laid their complaints in such fort, as they might be a convenient foundation of the warre by them intended : nor yet having purpose to depart well satisfied, & thereby to corroborate the prefent peace, were doubtfull how to order the matter, in fuch wife as they might neither too rudely, like boiftrous Gallo-Greeks, pretend onely the goodnesse of their fwords; nor yet over-modestly, to retain among the Greeks an opinion of their justice, forbeare the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other fide was wearie of these tedious guests; that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to fay. At length came news, without any certaine author, That Prolomy was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Egypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdome, and L. Cornelius, to prevent him thereof, and set the Countrie in good order. Cornelius was fent from Rome Embassadour, both to Anisochus and to Ptolomy: which gave him occasion to take leave, and prepare for his Egyptian voyage. Both he, and his fellow Embassadours, had good leave to depart all together: and the King foorthwith made ready, to be in Egypt with the first. To his sonne Seleucus he committed his Army, and lest him to oversee the building of Lysimachia: but all his Sea-forces he tooke along with him, and failed unto Ephefus. Thence he fent Embassadours to T. Quintius: whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of peace, after such fort as might stand with honestie and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage, he was perfectly informed that Ptolomy was alive. This made him beare another way from Egypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grievous shipwracke, made him without any further attempt on the way, glad to have safely recovered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went hero Antiochia, where he wintred : fecure, as might appeare, of the Roman

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treaty at Lysimachia, (at least-50 wise not long before or after it) one of their Embassadours that had beene sent unto the Macedonian, gave him counsaile, as in a point highly tending to his good; not to rest contented with the Peace which was granted unto him by the Romans, but to desire so ciety with them, whereby they should be bound to have the same friends and enemics. And this he advised him to doe quickly before the Warre brake out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to have awaited some sit occasion of taking Armes againe. They who dealt thus plainly, did not meane to be satisfied with weake excuses. In like manner some of the Greekes were solicited; and particularly the Aevolians,

That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the friendship of the people of Rome. It was needlesse to say plainly whereto this entreatie tended: the froward answer made by the Aevolians, declares them to have well understood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the victory, as they had beene during the Waire. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cried out that they had beene wronged, and destrauded of what was promised unto them: upbraiding withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not onely for their victory over Philip, but even for helping them to set foot in Greece, which else they never could have done. Hereto the Roman gave gentle answers: telling them that there was no more to doe, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and utter their griefes; and then should all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended against Antiochus. The fame hereof arriving at Carrhage, gave matter unto the enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to picke a thanke of the Roman Senate, and to chase out of their citie this honourable man, whom they fo greatly hated. He had of late exercised his vertue against them in the Civill administration; and given them an overthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Judges at that time bore all the fway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and having subject unto them, the lives, goods, and same of all the rest. Ncither did they use this their power with moderation but conspired in such wise together, that who so offended any one of them, should have them all to be his enemies; which being once knowne. He was fure to be foone accused and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the citie, Hannibal was chosen Prætor. By vertue of which Office, though he was fuperiour unto them during that yeere: yet had it not beene their manner to beare much regard unto fuch an annuall Magistrate, as at the yeeres end must bee accountable to them, if ought were laid unto his charge. Hannibal therefore fending for one of the Quæftors, or Officers of the Treasurie, to come and speake with him: the proud Quæftor fet lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the adverse Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place were to be chosen into the Order of Judges: in contemplation whereof, he was filled already with the spirit of future Greatnesse. But hee had not to doe with fuch a tame Prætor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal fent for him by a Pursivant; and having thus apprehended him, brought him into judgement before a publique affembly of the people. There he not onely shewed, what the undutiful stubbornenesse of this Quastor had beene; but how unfufferable the infolencie of all the Judges at the prefent was: whose unbridled power made them to regard neither Laws nor Magistrates. To this Oration when hee perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and favourable; Hee forthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the general good liking; That the Judges should be chofen from yeere to yeere, and no one man be continued in that Office two yeeres together. If this Law had beene passed, before he passed over Iberus: it would not perhaps have beene in the power of Hanno, to have brought him unto necessity of reforming another grievance, concerning the Koman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to levie by Taxation laid upon the whole Commonaltie, as wanting money in their publique Treasurie, wherewith to defray either that, or divers other needfull charges. Hannibal confidering this beganne to examine the publique Revenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treasurie, by wayes and meanes whatfoever; and in what fort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinary charges of the Common-wealth did not exhauft the Treasurie: but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their owne use, were thereby faine to loade the people with needlesse burdens. Hereof he made fuch plaine demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasure were compelled to restore, with shame, what they had gotten by knaverie : and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessitie of making such poore shifts, as formerly they had used, when they knew not the value of their owne Estate. But as the vertue of Hannibal was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: fo they of the Roman Faction, which had, fince the making of the peace untill now, little regarded him, beganne to rage extremely; as being by him stript of their ill-gotten goods, and illemployed authority, both at once, even when they thought themselves to have been in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they sent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong againe, and Hannibal would shortly be in armes. Questionlesse, if oppressing the City by injustice. and robbing the Treasurie, were the only way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: these Enemies to the Barchines might well crie out, That having done their best already to keepe all in quiet, they faw none other likelihood than of Warre. But having none other matter to alledge, than their owne inventions: they faid, That Hannibal was like unto a wilde beast, which would never be tamed: That secret messages past betweene him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complaine of idlenesse, as if it were harmefull to Caribage; with what elfe to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not unto the Senate: but addressing their letters crastily, every one to the best of his owne friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neither publike notice of their Conspiracie was taken at Carthage; nor the authoritie of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpose. Onelv P. Scipio is faid to have admonished the Fashers, that they should not this dishonourably subscribe, and become Seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppresse. by fuborning or countenancing false witnesses against him; the man, against whom in warre they had not of long time prevailed, nor used their Victory in such base manner. when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all fo great-minded as Scipio : they wished for some such advantage against Hannibal; and were glad to have found it. Three Embassadours they sent over to Carthage, C. Servilius, 2. Terentius, and M. Claudius 20 Marcellus: whose very names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These having past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their comming; and being by them instructed how to carry themselves, gave out, That they were sent to end some controversies, between the Caribaginians and Masanissa. But Hannibal had kept fuch good espiall upon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough : against which he was never unprepared. It were enough to fay, That he escaped them by flight: but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Having openly shewed himselfe, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, He went forth of the Towne when it began to waxe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though fuch as he might well trust. He had appointed Horses to be in a readinesse at a certaine place; whence riding all night, Hee came to a Tower of his owne by the Sea-side. There had he a Ship furnished with all things needfull; as having long expected the necessitie of some such journey. So hee bade Africk farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Countrey, more than his owne. Passing over to the Ile of Cercina; hee found there in the Haven some Merchants shippes of Carthage. They faluted him respectively: and the chiefe among them began to enquire, whither he was bound. Hee faid, Hee went Embassadour to Tyre: and that he entended there in the Iland to make a facrifice; whereto he invited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Ships. It was hot weather: and therefore he would needes hold his Feast upon the shore; where , because there wanted covert, He made them bring thither all their failes and yards to be used in stead of Tents. They did so; 40 and featted with him till it was late at night: at which time he left them there afleepe: and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was fure not to be purfued. For the Merchants did neither make hafte to fend any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embaffadour : neither could they, without some losse of time, such of them as made most speed homeward, get away from Cercina; being busied awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the misse of so great 2 person was diversly construed. Some ghessed aright, That he was sled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where he had beene seene: and then the Roman Embassadours, having none other errand thi- 50 ther, accused him (with an evill grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they onely discovered the mischiese by them intented against him, and the malice of their Senate; missing the while their purpose, and causing men to understand, that hee sled not thus without great reason. Hannibal comming to Tyre, the Mother-City of Carthage, was there entertained Hannibal comming to Tyre, the Mother-City of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinitie betweene their Cities, thought themselves to have interest. Thence went he to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, visited his son in Daphne; who friendly welcom-

As Antiochus had cause to be glad in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore sorrie; otherwise than as they had much disgraced themfelves by discoverie of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Countrie. For it would not prove alike easieunto this great Commander, to make stout Souldiers of base Assaurages; as it had bin by his training and discipline, to make very serviceable and skilfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gaules, and other Nations, that were hardie, though unexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especito ally being fo extraordinary could alter the nature of a cowardly people: yet was it therewithall confiderable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the basenesse of his Flatterers, and a thousand other such vexations, would bee farre more powerfull in making unprofitable the vertue of Hannibal, now a desolate and banished man, than had bin the villanie of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those actions wherein he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely help to ennoble the Roman Victory: or if it further ferved to hearten Antiochus, and make him leffe carefull to avoid the wars then should it further serve, to justific the Romans in their quarrell. And it seemes indeed that it was no little part of their care to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antio-20 chm, as is faid before, having newly fent Embassadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that he had any meaning to take Armes ; unlesse by meere violence he were thereto enforced. Onely the Liolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, desirous of innovation, and therefore practifing with his Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard. and to appeale them; they had of late beene answered with gentle words by one of the ten Counsailours, That the Senate would grant them whatsoever with reason they should aske. But this promise was too large, and unadvised. For when their Embassadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who favoured them leaft. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themselves: otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romans out of

Greece for very shame; who had no desire to be thence gone. The daily talke at Rome was of war with Aniochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leave the Countrie. For the Liolians were wont to upbraid therest of the Greeks with the vain libertie which the Romans had proclaimed, faying, That these their Deliverers had laid heavier fetters upon them, than formerly they did weare; but yet brighter & fairer, than those of the Macedonian: likewise, that it was a gracious act of Tisus, to take from the legs of the Greeks their chaine, & tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip had made no delay, in accomplishment of that which was laid upon him: all the Townes of Greece were at liberty, and the whole Countrie at peace, both with the Romans, and within it selfe. As for Antiochus; He made it his daily fuit, That the Peace between him and Rome, such as it was, might be confirmed, and strengthened by a League of more assurance. Neverthelesse, T. Quintius would needs feare that Antiochus meant forthwith to feize upon Greece, as foone as he and his Armie were thence departed. And in this regard, He retained ftill in his owne hands Chalcis, Demetrias, and the Aerocorinthus: by benefit of which Townes, he might the better withstand the dangerous Invasion like to be made by Antiochus. Suteable unto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the ten Embaffadours, that had beene fent over to affift him; when they returned backe into the Citie. Antiochus, they faid, would questionlesse fall upon Greece: wherein he should finde not only the Etolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon, ready to give him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to do somewhat against these their suspected enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilest Antiochus was farre away in Syria, and not intentive to his businesse. These reports went not onely current through the City, among the Vulgar; but found fuch credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeere against which time it was expected that Antiochsu should be ready to take his great enterprise in hand; P. Cornelius Scipio the African, defired, and obtained a fecond Confulfip, with intention to be Generall in the Warre; against the King and his

Hannibal. For the present, the businesse with Nabis was referred unto Titus; to deale with him as he thought good. This would be a faire colour of his longer tarriance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof also he knew that many of the Greekes would not be forry sthough for his owne part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him, two or three veeres before this, as is already shewed, whilest he had warre with Philip: and had further beene contented for the Romans fake to be at peace with the Achaens; neither fince that time had he done any thing, whereby he should draw upon himselfe this Warre. He was indeed a deteltable Tyrant, and hated of the Achains; as one, that be fides his owne wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great mischiefe. Titus therefore 10 had a plaufible Theme, whereon to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Cities; Which he caused to meet for that purpose at Corinch. He told them, That in the war with Philip, nor only the Greeks, but the Romans themselves, had each their motives apart (which he there briefly rehearfed) that should stirre them up, and cause them to be earnest. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis. the Romans had none other interest, than onely the making perfect of their honour, in fetting all Greece at liberty: which noble Action was in some fort maimed, or incompleat, whilest the noble City of Arges was left in subjection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged unto them, the Greekes, duely to confider, whether they thought the deliverance of Argus a matter worthy to be undertaken; or whether 20 otherwise to avoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leave it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greeks themselves. The Athenian Embassadour made answer hereunto wery eloquently, and as pleasing as he could devise. He gave thankes to the Romans for what was past sextolled their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Proposition : wherein unrequested they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement request of their poore Associates. they had already of late extended unto the Greeks. To this he added, That great pittie it was to heare, such notable vertue & high deferts ill spoken of by some : which took upon them, out of their owne imagination, to forestell what harme these their Benefa- 10 ctors meant to doe hereafter: when as Thankefulnesse rather would have required an acknowledgement of the benefits and pleafures already received. Every one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Atolians. Wherefore Alexander the Asolian to leup, and told the Athenians their owne: purting them in minde of their ancient glory, in those times when their City had beene the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recovery of the liberty generall: from which honour they were now fo farre falne; that they became Parafites, unto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base affentation, would leade all the rest into servitude. Then spake hee against the Achaens, Clients that had beene along time unto the Macedonian; and Souldiers of Philip untill they ranne away from his advertity. Thefe, he faid, had gotten Corinth, 40 and must now have warre be made for their fakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Liolians, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwayes beene friends unto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did he thus containe himselfe, but objected unto the Romans, fraudulent dealing: forafmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demerrias, Chalcis, and the Acrosorinih; having beene alwayes wont to professe, That Greece could never be at liberty, whileft those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seeke by this discourse of warre with Nakis, than businesses wherewith to finde themselves occupied, that fo they might have some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Country? But they should doe well, if they meant as they spake, to carry their Legions home out of 50 Greece : which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis ; the Atolians themselves did promise, & would undertake, That they would either cause him to yeeld to reason, and relinquish Argesfreely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to Submit himselfe to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at unity. These words had beene reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common liberty wrought fo much with thefe Attelians; as did their ownersvenous defire of oppreffing others, and getting unso themselves, that worse would use it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had loft. Neither could they well diffemble this; making it no fmall part of their grievance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had beene covenanted. That the Romans should enjoy the spoile of all, but leave the Townes and Lands in possession of the Etolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefes by them done in former times, made the whole affembly, especially the Acheans, crie out upon them: entreating the Romans to take fuch order before they went, that not onely Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Liolian theeves be enforced to keepe home, and leave their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus: who faw, that by discountenancing the Ætolians, He was become the more gracious with all the to reft. But whether it pleased him so well that Aniochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard upon him, to draw the peace to some good conclusion, it may bee greatly doubted. He cast them off with a sleight answer: telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counfailours which had beene fent unto him from Rome, to be his affiftants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not

CHAP.5. S.4.

Now concerning the Laced amonian warre; it was very foone ended. For Titus used the helpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if he should have had to doe with Philip. Besides the Roman forces. King Eumenes with a Navie, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the service: as also 20 Philip of Macedon fent aid by Land; doing therein poorely, whether it were to get favor of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in feeking revenge upon Nabis that had done him injurie. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Achaans, who fet out ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Ætolians: rather to hold good fashion, and found their dispositions, than in hope to speed, their helpe was required; whereof they excused themselves as well as they thought best. Thus are the Acheans now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; having removed the Etolians from that degree of favour: like as they themselves hereafter (though not in all hafte) shall be supplanted of the same Lacedamonians, against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argives, more bold than wife, began a conspiracie against the Lacedamonians that held their Town; meaning to open their gates unto the Roman. But ere Titus drew neere, they were all detected and flaine: excepting a very few, that escaped out of the Towne. The fame of this Commotion, caused the Army to march apace toward Arros; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no stir within the Walls: the execution done upon the first movers, having terrefied all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to affaile Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedemon, than to confume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedome whereof fince the Warre was made, pitie it were, that the calamities of the warre

Nabis had in readinesse an Army of sisteene thousand, wherewith to defend himselfe against these Invaders. Five thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his owne Countrie; but fuch as were of all others the worst, as manumised slaves, malefactors and base peasants, unto whom his Tyranny was beneficiall. Of the good and worthy Citizens he flood in doubt, and fince he could not hope to win their love, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an affembly: and compaffing them round in with his Army, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves; they might, he said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemie. But forafmuch as turbulent heads were invited by light occafions, to raise tumults, and worke dangerous treason: it seemed unto him the safest, and (withall) the mildest course, to arrest before-hand, and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keepethem innocent personce; and thereby preserve not onely the City and his own person from danger, but them also from the punishment, which else they might have incurred. Hereupon he cytes and apprehends about fourescore of them; whom he leades away to prison, and the next night putteth them all to death. Thus was he fure that they neither should offend, nor yet breake loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abroad : what could itelse doe than terrefie the people; who must thereby understand, that it was a mortall crime to be suspected? And to the same purpose his cruelty extended it selfe unto fome poore wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to flie to the Enemy. These were openly whipt through all the streets, and flaine. Having thus affrighted the Citizens: He turned the more freely, all his thoughts roward the Enemie, that came on apace. He welcommed them with a fallie: wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Towne had the better at first; but were at length repelled with losse. Titus abode nor many dayes before Sparia: but over-ranne the Countrey's hoping belike to provoke the Tyrant forth to bartaile. The Roman Fleet at the same time, with King Eumenes and the Rhodians, laid fiege unro Gyuheum, the onely or principall Town that Nabis had. Likely they were to have taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treafon. There were two Governours within the Towne equal in authority: whereof the to one, either for feare, or desire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, slue the Traitor; after whose death, he himselfe alone made the better desence. Yet when T. Quinitus with part of his Armie came thither to Gyuheum: this Captaine of the Towne had not the heart to abide the uttermost, and await what either Time or his Master might doe for him, but was contented to give up the place; yet upon Condition, to depart in fafety to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the sonne-in-law of Nabis, and brother unto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Government, with a thousand Souldiers Mercenaries, and two thousand Argives: it being (as may seeme) the Tyrants purpose, to relieve Gyttheum: which he thought would have held longer out. But when 20 they heard that it was loft, then began they to thinke upon finishing the warre, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was sent his Embassadour to Titus : requesting onely that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speak with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant spake very reasonably for himselfe: proving, that he suffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments; whereof the fumme was, That what foever they now did, or could object unto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred, That neither for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alledged, they ought to make warre upon him; fince Arges, and all other their allegations what foever, had not hindered them, in time of their more need of him, from 20 entring into that League with him; which was never broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quinius was not herewith fatisfied. He charged him with Tyranny; & gave instance, as easily he might, of divers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points for a fmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guiltie, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him; it was expedient, that some other cause of this Invasion should by alledged. Wherefore he said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to joyne with Philip; when he was their enemy, not onely in League, but also in affinity; and that his Fleet had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Pyracie, fince in the Articles by Titus propounded unto Nabit, there was no restitution mentioned, other than of ships, by him taken from the Greeks his neighbours, with whom he had long held warre: it may feeme to have beene objected, onely by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very frivolous. As for Mellene, and the bargaine of Alliance made with Philap: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betweene the Romans and this Tyrant; and thereforg not to have beene mentioned. All this it feems that Ariftanus, the Prætor of the Ashaans, very well perceived: who therefore doubting lest the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their owne justice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbeare to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had never done them wrong; framed his discourse to another end. Heentreated Nabis 50 to consider well of his owne estate; & to settle his fortunes, whilest he might do it without hazzard: alledging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbourcities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to furrender their Estates, and lived in great security, honour, and happinesse, as private men. Thus they discoursed untill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos; and requested them, to deliver unto him in writing their other demands, that he might take counfaile with his friends. The iffue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must be, for maintenance of an Army to lie in Leaguer all that Winter (as there was no hope of making short worke) before the City of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, upon fuch Conditions as Titus should thinke meet. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending: Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very grievous. He would not suffer the Lacedamonian to have ought to doe in the Ile of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor warre, either in that Iland or else-where; not to build any Towne or Castle upon his owne Lands; not to keepe any other shipping, than two small Barkes; besides many other troublesome injunctions; with imposition of an hundred talents in filver to be paid out of hand, and fifty talents yearly, for eight to veeres next enfuing. For observance of these Covenants he demanded five hostages, fuch as he himselfe should name; and one of them to be the Tyrants owne sonne. If it had been the meaning of Taus, to withdraw the warre from Nabis, because it was not grounded upon justice: then had it beene enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which he himselfedid offer, though it were for feare, to deliver up. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound unto the state of their best friends in Greece. by the extirpation of this Tyranny: then should this enterprise, when once it was taken in hand, have bin profecuted unto the very utmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held: as it was not honourable unto them, to enrich themselves by the spoile of one that had not offended them: nor pleasing to the Acheans, who judged it ever after a great blemish to the noble acts of Times: To did it minister unto the Atolians, and to fuch as curioufly pried into the faults of those which tooke upon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren Subject of malicious discourse. For fince Philip, a King, and descended of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Masterly Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Townes in Greece, that had belonged unto his Ancestors: it was thought very strange, that Lacedamon, once the most famous Citie among all the Greeks, was by the fame Romans left in possession of a Tyrant, that had usurped it but vesterday; and he thereinrooted by their authority, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other fide thought himfelfe unmercifully dealt withall, by the felfe-fame Romans, whose amity he had preferred in time of a doubtfull warre, before the love and affinity of the Macedonian King, that had committed the City of Argos into his hands. But failly had he dealt with the Macedonian and failly was he dealt with by those to whom he did betake himselfe. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleafed him; fave onely that for the banished Lacedamonians; (of whom a great number were in the Roman Campe; having among them Agefipelis the naturall King of Sparta, that being a young childe was driven out by Lyoungus the first of the Tyrants) there was made no provision, to have them restored unto their Citie and Estates; but onely leave required for as many of their wives, as would be so contented, to live abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore he forbore to give consent unto these demands: and fustained an affault or two; hoping belike that the enemies would soone bee wearie. But his fearefull nature shortly overcame the resolution, which the sense of these injuries had put into him. So yeelding unto all that had been propounded, He delivered the hostages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward. He thought the Romans farre more wicked than himselfe; and was ready upon the first advantage, to doe them all the mischiefe that he could.

of the History of the World.

The Argives had heard newes that Lacedamon was even at point of being taken. This erected them, and gave them heart to thinke upon their owne good. So they adventured to fet upon the Garrison; which was much weakened, by the remove of the three thousand carried thence by Pythagoras to helpe the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed unto their liberty no more, than that all of them joyntly should set their hands to the getting of it; which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this carrie T. Quintus to Argos, where he was joyfully welcommed! He was deservedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had layed hold without staying for him: and that he might the better entitle himselfe thereto; he caused the liberty of the Argives to be proclaimed at the Nemanan games; as ratifying it by his authority. The Citie was annexed againe to the Councell of Achaia; whereby the Achains were not more strengthened, than the Argives themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into the fame extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little businesse or none wherewith to set on worke his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to fend another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly disposed unto quiet, Scipio the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not have his desire, of being fent Commander into Greece. The un-fyncere meaning of Aniochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Aerolians, were held as considerations worthy of regard: yet not fufficient causes of making War. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Aetolians, & of throughly perswading all the Greekes (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to affure unto themselves the patronage of Greece) that 10 the good of the Countrie was their fole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation unto it selfe, till occasion should be ripe, and call them over againe. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any neere diffance appearing; he called an Affembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinb: where he meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted unto them all that had paffed fince his comming into those parts: and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsell; touching the moderate use of their liberty, & the care which they ought to have of living peaceably, and without faction. Lastly he gave up Acrocorinthus to the Achaans; with- 20 drawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to do the like (which very soone he did) at Chalcis and Demerrias ; that fo it might be knowne , what lyers the Aetolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those places. With joyfull acclamations did the Greekes testifie their good liking of that which Titus had faid and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to ransome and enlarge all Romans, that had been fold into their Countrey by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end : and by leaving the Countrie before his departure was urged, left therein behinde him the memory of his vertue and benefits, untainted by jealousie and suspition of any evill meaning. At his comming to the City, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodlieft of all that 30 Rome had untill that day beheld. Three dayes together the shew of his pomp continued: as being fet out with the spoiles of a Countrie, more aboundant in things worthy of fuch a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made Warre. All forts of Armes, with Statues and curious pieces of Braffe or Marble, taken from the Enemie, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Silver: some in the rude Masse unwrought, some in divers forts of Coine; and some in Veffels of fundry kindes, that were the more highly prized by the workemanship. Among these were tenne shields, all of Silver; and one of pure Gold. The third day Trius himselfe entred the City in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and foureteen Crownes of Gold, bestowed upon him by divers Ci- 40 ties. There were also led the beafts for Sacrifice; the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrius the some of King Philip, and Armenes the son of Nabis, were principall. After him followed his Army; and (which added much grace, and good liking to the shew) the Roman Captives, by his procurement redeemed from slaverie in

Not long after this Triumph, He procured audience of the Senate for many Embaffages, that were come out of Greece and Afra. They had all very favourable answers, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred over to T. Quintius, and the ten that had bin his Counfailors; because their businesse was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadors wondred. They faid unto Titus 50 and his Affociates, That they could not discern wherein confisted any perplexity of their message. For all Treaties of peace and friendship, were either betweene the Victor and the vanquished; between those, that having warred together, were upon equal termes of advantage; or betweene those that had lived alwayes in good agreement, without any quarrell. Unto the Victor, they faid, that the vanquished must yeeld; and patiently endure the imposition of some Covenants, that else might seeme unreasonable. Where Warre had beene made, and no advantage gotten: there was it usuall to demand and make restitution of things and places claimed, gotten, or lost; accordingly as both parts could agree. But betweene those which had never fallen out, there ought no Condirions of establishing friendship to be proposed: since it was reasonable, that each pair should hold their owne; and neither carry it felfe as superiour to the other, in preseribing ought that might be trouble some. Now of this last kind, was the league and friendthin that had beene fo long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being fo : they held it strange, that the Romans should thus infift on points no way concerning them, and take upon them to prescribe unto the King, what Cities of Asia he should fet at liberty; from what cities they would give him leave to exact his wonted Tributes; either putting or not putting his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should thinke firno Hereto Quintin answered, that fince they went so distinctly toworke, He would also doe the like. Wherefore he propounded unto them two Conditions, and gave them their choyce whether to accept: Either that it should be lawfull for the Romans to take part in Alia with any that would feek their friendship; Or if King Antiochus misliked this, and would have them for beare to meddle in Afia, that then he flould abandon what foever he had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing, but no reasonable nor pertinent answer, to that which the Kings Embassadors had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abstaine from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately won in Europe. then did not the affaires of Smyrna, Lampfacus, or any other Affairiques, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, binde them in honour to make Warre with a 20 King that fought their love, and had never done them injury. But they knew very well. that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliver up unro them the Citie of Lysimachia, whereon of late he had beene at so much cost; in building it up even from the foundation, and repeopling it with Inhabitants, that had all been differfed. or captive to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadors with great indignation alledged : faying, That Antiochus defired friendship of the Romans ; but fo, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke upon themas if their cause were far the superiour. For it was they faid, their purpose to set at liberty those Towns. which the King would oppreffe and hold in Subjection: especially fince those Townes were of Greekilb bloud and language and fell, in that regard, under the patronage which 30 Rome had affoorded unto all Greece befides. By this colour they might foon have left Anweekus King of not many subjects on the hither side of Euphrates. Neither did they forbeare to fay, That unleffe he would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning nor onely to protect those which relyed upon them in Asa, but therein to make new Allian. ces: namely (as might be understood) with fuch as were his subjects. Where for they urged his Embaffadors to come to a point, and tell them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleafing answer, which the Embaffadors could not hereto make; little wanted of giving presently defiance to the King. But they fuffered themselves to be entreated, & were contented once again to send over P. Villius, &'others that had bin already with the king at Lysimachia; by whom they might receive a finallanswer, whether these demands made by Quintim and his Associates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitlesse Treaties ensuing, Amiochus got the leifure of two yeares, or thereabouts, to prepare for War; finding in the Roman's all that while no disposition to let him live in peace.

Of the long Wars which the Romans had with the Gaules Liquians, and Spaniards. Of Mi Porcius Caro. Injuries done by Mafaniffa to the Carthaginians, that fue to the Romans for justice in vaine.

He Infubrians, Bojians, and other of the Cifalpine Gaules, together with the Ligui rians; made often and (in a manner) continuall Warre upon the Remans in Italy, even from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, untill fuch time as they themselves were utterly subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the very height of their Empire. These Nations, having served under Mago for vvages, and afterwards having gotten Amiliar a Carthaginian, to be Leader unto them all, as hath beene already shewed; by this their fellowship in Armes, grew to be fuch willing partakers each of others fortune, that feldome afterwards either the Gaules or Ligurians did stir alone; but that their Companions, hearing ch258. of this it, were ready to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possessions in Gallia Cifalpina, now called Lumbardie; it hath been long fince rehearfed between the first and second Panick Wars. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Country, by meanes of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neither is it likely that the re-conquest would have been more difficult or tedious unto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed unto this War, had not been diffracled by the Ligurians; that alwayes made them to proceed warily, having an eye to the 10 danger at their backes. The Ligurians were a front Nation, light and swift of body; well practifed in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any overthrow, but forthwith ready to fight againe. Their Country was mountainous, rough, wooddie, and full of straight and dangerous passages. Few good Townes they had; but many Cassles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: fo as without much labour, they could neither bee taken nor befieged. They were also very poor; and had little or nothing that might give contentment unto a victorious Army that should spoyle their Land. In these respects. they served excellently well to traine up the Roman Souldiers to hardnesse and military patience: teaching them(befides other exercises of Warre)to endure much, and live contented with a little. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their love unto the Gaules, 20 their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territory of their borderers, that were subject unto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begun, feemes to have been grounded upon the Condition of all Salvages; To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Judgement : and to acknowledge no fuch vertue in Leagues, or formall conclusions of Peace, as oughtto hinder them from using their advantage, or taking revenge of injuries when they returne to minde. This quality is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Warres betweene them and any of their neighbours, docuse commonly this answer, It bath still beene the sustome for us and them, to fight one against the other.

Divers overthrowes, though none that vveregreat, these Ligurians gave unto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they received. Often they fought peace, when they found themselves in distresse; and brake it agains as often, when they thought it profitable fo to do. The best vvas that as their Country was a good place of exercise unto the Romans, so out of their own Country they did little harme: not sending any great Armies far from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make Warre, save on their owne ground. The Countrey of Spaine, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italy that became subject unto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Provinces, which was wholly and throughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers unto an 40 Oxe-hide and the Romans found in it the property of that Oxe-hide which Calanus the Indian shewed unto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For treading upon any fide of it, the further parts vould rife from the ground. And thus vvas it with Spain. Seldome did it happen that those parts from which the Roman Armies lay furthest, vvere not up in rebellion. The Spaniards vvere a very hardy Nation, and easily stirred up to armes; but had not much knowledge in the art of War, nor any good Captaines. They vvanted also (vvhich vvas their principall hinderance) good intelligence among themselves: and being divided into many small Signiories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldome or never provided in generall for the common good of their Country; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to look unto their 50 owne Territory Such private respects made them often to fall asunder, when many had united themselves together, for chasing out of the Romans. And these vvere the causes of their often overthrowes: as defire of liberty, rather than complaint of any vvrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking armes.

The Carthaginians had beene accustomed, to make evacuation of this Cholericke Spanish humour; by employing, as Mercenaries in their Warres abroad, those that vvere most likely to be unquiet at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Countrey, and used them in another: finding meanes to pay them all, out of the profits yvhich which they raifed upon the whole Countrey; as being far better husbands, and of more dexterity than were the Romans, in that kinde. But contrariwife, the Romans, using the fervice of their owne Legions, and of their fure friends the Latines, had little businesse for the Spaniards; and therefore were fain to have much businesse with them. Spaine was too far diffant, and with all too great for them to fend over Colonies thicker, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they took in Italy. Wherefore it remained, that they should alwaies maintain such Armies in the Country, as might serve to hold it in obedience perforce; and such heedfull Captains, as might be still ready to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did; and thereby held the Countrey: though feldome in peace.

Very foone after the departure of Seipio, there was raifed Warre in Spaine against the Romans, even upon the same generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish Warres following. It was thought unreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while helpe the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Carthaginians, basely forgetting to help themselves against those that were strangers, yet usurped the Dominion over them. But the forces which Scipio had left behinde him in that Countrey, being well acquainted with the manner of Warre in those parts, suppreffed this Rebellion by many victories: and together with fubjection, brought peace upon the Countrey; which lafted five yeares. This Victory of the Romans, though it happily ended the Warre: yet left it still remaining the cause of the Warre; which after five yeares brake out againe. The Spaniards fought a battell with the Roman Proconfull, whom they flew; and had a great Victory, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happy successe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to fend thither two Prætors, and with each of them some two Legions. These did fomewhat: yet not fo much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Confull the year following, and fent into that Province; found at his comming little leffe to doe, than the reconquering of all Spaine. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: fome were faithfull to Rome; and fome were idle beholders of the paines that others tooke. Yet when Cate had wonne a great Victory upon the chiefest of to them; they rose against him in many parts of the Countrey, and put him unto much new trouble. Whilest he was about to make a journey against those that were as yet unfubdued: fome of the lately vanquished, were even ready to rebell. Hee therefore difarmed them: which they tooke so heavily, that many of them slew themselves for very griefe. Hearing of this, and well understanding, that such desperation might worke dangerous effects; Hee called unto him the principall among them: and commending unto them peace and quietnesse, which they never had disturbed but unto their owne great losse, He prayed them to devise what course might be taken, for holding them asfured unto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would give counfell in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their invention barren in this kinde of Subject; He gave expresse charge, That upon a day appointed they should throw downe the walls of all their Townes. Afterwards hee carried the Warre about from place to place; and with fingular inclustry finished it in short time. Neither thought he it any difference to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an army of the Celtiberians, against other of their Countrimen: excusing the indignity, such as it seemed, with a jest, That if he were vanquished and slaine, then should he need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victory, He could pay them with the enemics money. Finally, He brought the Warre to so good end, that in long time after, though Spaine were often troublesome, yet was it inno danger of being loft. He increased also the publike Revenues in that Province, by caufing fome Mines of Iron and Silver to be wrought, that had before laine unregarded. Herein he did benefit the Common-wealth by a vertue much agreeable to his owne peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not onely very notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed the occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other useful qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might feeme requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was very skilfull in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, and not unprofitable in any bufineffe either private or publike. Many books he wrote: whereof the principall were, of the Roman antiquities, & of husbandry. In matter Qqqqq 2 of husbandry he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of meane birth, and the first of his House. Strong of bodie he was, and exceeding temperate: so as he lived in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him unto the better fort of the Remans, was his great fincerity of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himselfe to the ancient laudable Customes of the Citie. Herein hee had merited fingular commendations, if the vehemencie of his nature had not caused him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other worthy men; that were no leffe honest than himselfe, though farre leffe rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwife, He was a very good Citizen, and one of fuch temper, that he could fashion himselfe to all occasions; as if he were never out of his Element. He loved businesse so well, or ro rather hated vice fo earnestly; that even unto the end of his life, He was exercised in defending himselse or accusing others. For at the age of sourcescore and six years, he pleaded in his owne defence: and foure yeares after, he accused Sergius Galba unto the people. So beganthe Nobility of Cato his family; which ended in his great grand-child M. Cato the Utican: one that being of like vertue and fervencie, had all his good purposes dasht, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such Nobility and Greatnesse as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Warres, after Cato his departure out of the Countrie, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrie seldome free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Prætors therefore, of which two every yeare 10 were sent over Commanders into Spaine (that was divided into Governments) did rarely faile of such worke, as might affoord the honour of Triumph. One slew thirteene thousand Spaniards in a battell: another tooke fifty Townes; and a third enforced many States of the Countrey to fue for peace. Thus every one of them, or most ofthem, did some laudable service; and yet so, that commonly there were of men, townes, and people, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof, I have already pointed; and therefore think it enough to fay, That the businesse in Spaine required not the imployment of a Roman Consul, from fuch time as Caso thence departed, untill the Numantian Warre broke out, which was ve-

In all other Countries to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised all felicity which Rome could grant, unto themfelves and their obedient City: Masanissa fell to disputing with the sword about the title tothe best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitfull Region about the lesfer Syrtis: wherein, among other Cities, was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent unto Carthage for Tribute. This Country the Numidian challenged; and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claime unto the whole. Hee had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any Warre, without leave obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redresse, than by sending to Rome 40 their Complaint of his doings. And furely they wanted not good matter to alledge, if the Judges had beene impartiall. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out to them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Country: Masanisa himselfe, now very lately pursuing a Rebell that fled out of his Kingdome, defired leave of the Carthaginians, for himselfe to passe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise been questionable) that the Country was theirs. This notwithstanding, Mafanissa had wherewith to justifie his proceedings, especially unto the Roman Senate. He gave the Fathers to understand by his Embassadors, what faithlesse people the Carthaginians were, and how ill affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been fent unto them from Hannibal, one that should perswade them to take part with Antiochus. 50 This man they had examined upon some suspicion of his errand; yet neither arresting him nor his ship, had thereby affoorded him means to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainely it was their purposeto rebell; and therefore good policie to keepe them downe.

As for the Country of Emporia: it had alwaies, he faid, beene theirs that were able to hold it by strong hand : and so belonged sometime unto the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if the truth were knowne, the Citizens of Carthage had not any very warrantable title unto any more ground, than that whereon their City flood; or feareely to fo much. For they were no better than frangers in Africk, that had gotten leave there to build upon fo much ground, as they could encompasse with an Oxe-hide cut into small thongs. Whatsoever they held without fuch a compaffe, was purchased by fraud, and wrongfull encroachments. This confidered, Masanilla requested of the Senate, That they would not adjudge unto such usurpers, the Country fometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their affured friend. The Romans having heard these allegations on both sides found the matter so doubtfull, that they could not on the fudden tell what to determine. Wherfore because they would doe nothing rafhly sthey fent over three Embaffadors, of whom P. Scipio the African to was one and the chiefe, to decide the controversie: yet fecretly giving them instructions. to leave all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embaffadors followed their directions, and left all doubtfull. So was it likely, that Majaniffa with a ftrong Army should quickly prevaile against those that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime against the wrong. By such Arts were the Carthaginians held, not only from ftirring in favour of King Antiochus, if they had thereto any disposition; but were prepared by little and little unto their finall destruction: that came upon them, when the Romans had leifure to expresse the utmost of their hatred.

The Atolians labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis to War upon the Romans, by whom they hold themfelves wronged and difgraced. Nabis besiegeth Gytt beum, and wasteth (ome part of Achaa. The exact skill of Philopoemen in advantage of ground: whereby hee utterly vanguisheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied peace by the Romans, joynes with the AEtolians. The AEtolians surprize Demetrias; and by killing Nabis, their Confederate, feize upon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at Philopoemen his per-(wasions annexe themselves to the Achaans.

LL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieved much the AEtolians to thinke, that they who had promifed unto themselves the whole spoile of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greeks; were not only disappointed of their coverous hopes, but quite for saken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most unregarded. Yet was there made a great accesse to their Estate; by adding much unto them, of that which had been taken from the Macedonian. This might well have fufficed them, if their defires had not been immoderate; and their indignation more vehement, than their defire. But they were not so pleased with that which they had, fince they thought it no more than part of their due: as they were vexed with the denial of that which they claimed, and with finding themselves to be wholly dife-40 steemed, wherein they thought that they had unsufferable wrong. Wherefore they devised, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what meanes they best might right themselves; and give the Romans a sorrowfull knowledge of the difference between their enmity and friendship. To this purpose they soon agreed, as concurring all in one affection; That they would not onely perfwade Antiochus to make War upon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused Peace; but that they would deale with the King of Macedon their ancient enemy, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon, to joyne all together in a new Confederacy: whose joynt forces could not in all likelihood, but far furmount those of the Romans, Achaens, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprise, which the A Etolians took in hand; and well 50 befeeming them, for they were great darers. They fent Embaffadors to all these Kings, with perswasions, as they thought most forcible. But Philip was irresolute; and Antiochus willing to try first all other courses. Nabis the Lacedamonian, who neither (as Philip) had loft much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any War, ; yet shewed himselfe of all other the most forward: and not staying so much as to seeke any good pretence, began immediately to lay fiege unto Gytt heum, that had been lately taken from him by the Romans. The Acheans, to whose care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the affaires of Pelopennesus, were not flow to admonish Nabis of his duty : neither would they have staid long from repressing his violence by open War; had not some of them thought Qqqqq 3

it wisedome to aske Counsell of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintim, before they engaged themselves in a businesse of such importance. Whilst thus they spent the time in fending Embassadors, and were advised by Quinting to let all alone, and to wait for the comming of the Roman forces, that would shortly be amongst them: Nabu was bold to give them juster cause of complaint, by wasting their owne Territory.

Philopamen was then Pretor of the Achaans, who had long bin absent in Crete; making Warthere for his minds fake and recreation. Unto him the Acheans referred themfelves, giving him leave to order the War at his pleasure; either staying till the Romans came, or doing otherwise, as he should thinke best. He made all haste to relieve Gyttheum by Sea; fearing lest the Towne, and the Achaan Garrison within it, should be lost, if to he used any delay. But Philopamen was so bad a Sea-man, that hee knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrireme Gally his Admirall, that had fourescore yeares agoe beene counted a gallant Vessell, in the Navie of Antigonus Gonatus. Neither was the rest of his Fleet so good, as might encounter with that of the Laced amonian. Onely it fell out well, that he committed himselfe to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her wings, than with her talons. For his Admirall Gally was stemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leakes, and tooke in water so fast, that she was faine to yeeld without further resistance. When the rest of the Fleet faw what was become of their Admirall, all were presently discouraged, and saved themselves with what speed they could. But Philopamen was not herewith daunted. If 20 he had failed in Sea-fervice, which was none of his Occupation, He faid, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Army from the flege of Gyttheum, to stop the Achaens if they should invade his Countrey. But upon these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopamen came unexpected; fired their Camp, and put all, fave a very few of them, to the fword. Then marched hee with all his Army towards Lacedamon: within ten miles whereof he was when the Tyrant met him, that had already taken Gyttheum. It was not expected that Nabis would have been eready for them so soon. Or if he should come from Gyttheum, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that he must overtake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long Troupe reaching some five miles; having their 30 Horse, and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to beare off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly understood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Army; encamped there where they meant to have lodged. It was the custome of Philopamen, when he walked or travelled abroad with his friends, to marke the fituation of the Countrey about him; and to discourse what might befall an Army marching the same way. He viould suppose, That having with him there such a number of Souldiers, ordered and forted in such manner, and marching towards fuch a place; he were upon that ground encountred by a greater Army, or better prepared to the fight. Then would he put the question, Whether it vvere fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand : vvhat piece of ground it 40 were meet for him to feize upon and in what manner he might best do it in what fort he should order his men e vyhere bestow his carriages, and under vyhat Guard e in vyhat fort encampe himselfe : and which way march the day following : By such continuall meditation, Hee vvas growne so pertect, that he did never meet with any difficultie, vvhence he could not explicate himselfe and his followers. At this time hee made a stand: and having drawne up his Rere, Hee encamped neere unto the place where he was ; within halfe a mile of the Enemy. His baggage, with all thereto belonging, he beflowed on a Rocke; encompaffing them round with his Souldiers. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the prefent greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brook synhereto the Acha- 50 ans lay the neerer. This vvatering therefore was like to minister the first occasion of skirmish. Philopamen understood this; and laid an ambush in place convenient; whereinto the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were flaughtered in great numbers. Prefently after this, he caused one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe to the Tyrant, as a sugitive, and tell him, that the Acheans had a purpose to get between him and Lacedamon; whereby they voould both debarre his returne into the Citie, and withall encourage the people to take Armes for the recovery of their freedome. The Tyrant hearing this, marched haftily away; and left his Campe, which hardly otherwise would have beene forced. Some

Some companies he made to stay behind, and shew themselves upon the Rampart, thereby to conceale his departure. But Philopæmen was not fo to be beguiled. He eafily won the Camp and gave chase to Nabis: whose followers being overtaken, had no courage to turn about & make head. The enemies being thus dispersed and fled into woods where they lay in covert all that day: Philopumen conceived aright, that their fear and necessity would teach them to creep homewards, and fave themselves, when it grew dark. Wherefore in the Evening, when he had gathered together all those of his light-armature, which had followed the chase whilest it was day, he led forth the rest that had well refreshed themselves, and occupied the two most ordinary passages unto Lacedamon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiving in Philopamens Campe great flore of lights; thought that all had bin at reft: and therefore adventured to make an escape home. But they were fo way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirty dayes together after this, did Philopoemen wast the Country round about, whilest Nabis durst not iffue forth of his town; and then returned home, leaving the Tyrant in a manner without

The Roman Embassadors were then in Greece, and T. Quinting among them, labouring to make their partie strong against Aniochus and Nabis, whom they knew to be solicited by the Liolians. Very faire countenance they also made unto Philip; and with comfortable promifes drew him to make shew, whatfover he thought, of good correspondence. They promifed to restore unto him his some: and were contented to let him hope, that he should receive other favours at their hands; and regaine possession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for warre against Anizochu in Greece, whileft their Embassadours that were with him in Asia: denied otherwise to grant him Peace, than if he would yeeld unto one of the Conditions aby them fo often propounded. The long ablence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplified the marriage betweene Piolomie and his daughter; together with the death of young Antiochou the Kings sonne, which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or feemed to hinder the King from giving audience in person to the Embassadours; caufed them to returne home to Rome; as uncertain of their answer as at their ferting forth. 30 One thing that might have beene, and partly was, beneficiall unto them, they brought to passe during their abode at Ephesus; either by cunning, or (as Livie rather thinkes) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for having thus fled unto Anisochus, upon a caufeleffe fufpition wherein he held the Romans that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harme. Many have affirmed that P. Seipio was one of these Embassadours; and that he among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captaines that had lived, Hannibal judged the most worthy? So Hannibal gave to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrrhus the fecond: and the third he challenged unto himselfe. But Scipio, who thought his own title better, than that it ought to be fo forgotten, asked yet further. What wouldest thou have faid then, Hannibal, if thou hadft vanquished me? To whom the Carthaginian replied. Then would not I have given the first place to Alexander, but have claimed it as due unto my selfe. Now whether this were so, or otherwise, the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Koman Embassadors, made him suspected of Antiochus, who therefore did forbeare a while to use his counsell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King, and plainely defiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; he eafily recovered his former grace and credit. For hee told how his Father had caused him to sweare at the Altars, when he was a little boy, That he never should be friend unto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vaine furmifes: but to know thus much, That folong as he thought upon warre with 10 Rome, fo long would Hannibal doe him all good fervice: whereas contrariwise, if he intended to make peace, then should it behoove him to use the counsell of some other

The Ætolians, and their friends, were no leffe buffe all this while, in making their partie strong against the Romans, than were the Romans in mustering up their friends in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochin, vaunting much of their own forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the victory against Philip, that finally they prevailed with him; especially when the Roman Embassadors had left him without hope of peace, unlesse he would buy it at too deare a rate. They dealt in like fort with the Macedonian.

Burin vaine. He understood the Romans, and himselfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their owne forces to the uttermost: as knowing, that all the burthen must lie upon Anisochus and themselves, without helpe from any, save onely from fome few that were discontented in Greece. Whilest they were about this, and had with them an Embaffador of the King Antiochus, that animated them to resolution, the Athenian Embassadours, whom Tim had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a little; by exhorting them, notto conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay neere at hand. For want of a ready answer hereto, they were contented to approve the motion. Tam hearing this, thought the buffreffe worthy of his prefence. For fince Anisohus had now declared himselfe against the Romans jit would be no small 10 piece of service, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the adventure. Wherefore he came to their Panacolium, or great Affembly of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might ferve to appeale them. He willed them to confider the weight of the enterprise which they took in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaigne-field, on which, to the ruine of the Country, the Romans and King Antiechie, that commanded no finall part of the World, should fight for the Masterie: the Etolians, as Masters in that kind of Fence, setting them on, and becomming *Liv.l.35.admi. * the Sticklers. As for those grievances which did thus exasperate them, and urge them flist tiellistorie, to fuch violent courses, he willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might doe, to fend Embaffadours to Rome, that should either pleade 20 their right in the Senate, or (if their right unto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to have what they defired: than thus to fer the world in an uproare, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he faid, or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embaffador of the King, whose helpe they had fought, wait so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes unto them, to heare those comfortable words, That, by fending to Rome, they might happen to obtain what they defired; either as their right, or else by way of favour. For with such Termes had they bin sea-Red once already: and were by the Senate rejected unto Times who, having it in his owne power, gave them to fatisfaction; yet would now againe referre them to the Se- 30 nate. This were only losse of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more adoe they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be intreated to come over into i Greece, as well to fet the Gountry at liberty, as also to decide the controversies depending between the Romans and Aiolians. Such a Decree they would not have made, had they not understood the Kings minde before. Having made it, they forgot no point of bravery, whereby to vaunt themselves to the Kings Embalfadours, and against the Romans. Tim defired of their Prætor, tolet him see a Copie of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That then he had other things to doe: but that this Decree, and their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if he came to their Camp in Italy upon the river of Tibris. Gentler words would have done better, as 40 the Atolians are like to understand hereafter. But having thus begun, they meant henceforth to goe roundly to work. The care of the warre they referred unto the more private Councellof their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authority of a generall affembly. The Apoclesi (fo were the Privie Councell of Etolia called) went as hotly to worke as any of the youngest heads could have done. They laid a plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they took upon the sudden; entring some of them as friends, to conduct home a principall man of the Citie: who for speaking words against T. Quintin, had been driven to flee thence; but was, by intercession of those that loved him, again re-called. His Aulian companions, that were 50 not many, seized upon a Gate; whereat they let in a Troupe which they had left not far behind them: and fofell to murdering the chief of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they fped not fo well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Town prepared to defend it selfe against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostility, they gave a gentle an-Iwer, laying, That they came not thither as enemies, but onely to deliver the Town from the Romans; who more infolently domineered over it, than ever the Macedonians had done. By which Rhetoricke they prevailed no more, than they could doe by plaine force. For the Townef-men replied, That they neither found any abridgement of their libertie, nor needed any Garrison to keep them from the Romans, from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received injurie. So this bufinesse was dasht. The attempt upon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good friend, was Lord of the Town; styling himselfe King: but more truely by all mencalled Tyrant. He had welneere loft all, by means of the overthrow which Philopamen had lately given him : fince he durst not stirre abroad; and daily expected the mischiefe, that on all sides threatned him. Wherefore he fent meffengers, one after another, to the Aiolians; requesting them, That as he had not beene flow to stirre in their behalfe, but adventured himselfe upon the utmost of danger, when all others were backward; so they would be pleased 10 to fend him what helpe they might, fince his bad fortune had caused him presently to need it. It hath beene often faid, That the ravenous Etolians were only true to themfelves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship, otherwise, than as it might conduce to their owne ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabio his mercenarie forces, which upheld his Tyranny, were in a manner confumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; and, by so doing, to assure Lacedamon unto themselves. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for fuch a worke. To him they gave a thousand Foot, and thirtie Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirtie were by Democritus the Prætor brought into the Councell of the Apocleti, where they were commanded to be no wifer than they should be, nor to thinke 20 that they were fent to make warre with the Acheans, or to doe ought elfe, fave onely what Alexamenus should command them; which were it never so desperate, and in seeming against all reason; yet must they understand, that unlesse they performed it. they should have no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom he encouraged with brave words: telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to cover all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of worke, than of late with Philip: fince the Elephants of this great King, without other help, would fuffice to tread them downe. As for the Etolians, he faid, that if need should so require, they would 20 presently send away to Lacedamon all the forces that they could raise: But that they were very defirous at the prefent, to make as goodly a muster as they could, before the great king; which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater company. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had bin long pent up in the Citie; and traine them without the wals: as if shortly he should employ them in work of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his men in the field; riding up and downe with this Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his fashion, to step aside alone to his Atolians, and say fomewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned againe to Nabis. But when he faw time for the great work which he had in hand; he then went afide to his thirty horsemen, and bade them remember the taske enjoyned them at their fetting forth; telling them, that they were all in case of banished men, unlesse they would anon come up to him, and helpe him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant beganne to draw neere them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and strucke him downe. The thirtie Lolians never stood to deliberate upon the matter, but all flew in; and, before any fuccour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nabie. Prefently upon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ran unto the dead body: where, in flead of feeking revenge, they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Atolians hasted into the Citie, and feized on the Palace: where he fell to ranfacking the Treasure; and troubled himselfe with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Towne, didalso the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who feeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not indure to fee those that had slaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the town was shortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Captaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall stocke, that had beene brought up with Nabis his children; whom they mounted upon a good Horse, and made him their Chiefe. So they fell upon the tolians that were idly straggling about; and put them all to the sword. Alexamenus with CHAP 5.$.7.

with not many of his Company, were flaine in keeping the Citadel: and those few that escaped thence into Areadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who sold them all as bond-flaves. In this doubtfull Estate of things at Lacedamon, Philopamen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such words unto them, as Alexamenus calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such words unto them, as Alexamenus should have done after he had slainethe Tyrant; easily perswaded them for their owne spood and safety, to incorporate themselves with the Acheans. Thus by the enterprise, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Atolians; and the small, but effectuall, travell of Philopamen, the Acheans made a notable purchase: and Lacedamon, that had hitherto bingoverned either by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth, whereof the name had scarce any reputation, when Spartaruled over all Greece.

Antiochus, perswaded by Thoas the Ætolian, comes over into Greece ill attended. Sundry pass ges between him, she Ætolians, Chalcidians, and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole sle of Eubœa. The vanity of the Kings Embassadors and the Ætolians, with the civill answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achæans. That it concerned the Greekes to have desired peace betweene the Romans and Antiochus, as the best assurance of their owne libertie. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King. Of Aminander; and an 20 idle vanity, by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal gives good coinsell in vaine. Some Towns won in Thessalie. The King retires to Chalcis, where he marrieth a young wise, and revels away the rest of winter. Upon the comming of the Roman Consul all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Ætolians keeps the Streights of Thermopylæ. He is beaten, and slies into Asia: leaving all in Greece unto the Victors.

Nisochue was troubled much in Afia with Smyrna and Lampfacus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leave them Enemies behind him; and to win them by force, was more than hithertohe was able. Yet was he defirous, with all speed convenient, to shew himselfe in Greece; where 30 he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the country there was a very small number, which bore hearty affection unto the Romans: That Nabis was already up in arms: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chain, desiring nothing more, than to breake loofe; and that the Ætolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could have done, were ready to conferre upon him the greatnesse, which they had unworthily bestowed upon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise, as added credit unto all the rest. Whilest therefore the king was thinking to send Hannibal into Africk, there to molest the Romans, and fo give him the better leifure of using his own opportunities in Greece: Tho.ss the Audian came over to him, and bad him lay all other care afide; for that his Country-40 men had already taken Demetrias, a Town of main importance, that should give him enterrainment, whence he might proceed as became the greatnesse of his vertue & fortune. This did serve to cut offall deliberation. As for Hannibal, Thoas was bold to tel the king, first, That it was not expedient for him to divide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might ferve to lay open unto him all places, without need of using violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more unfit man to be employed in the kings service, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he faid, That the king should as greatly feele the losse of a Fleet or Army, perishing under such a notable Commander if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried under one of meaner qualitie: whereas neverthelesse if 50 Hannibal prevailed, Hannibal alone should have all the honor, and not Antiochia. In this regard he was of opinion, That fuch a renowned Warriour should be alwayes neere unto the Kings person, to give advice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good fuccesse would wholly redound unto the honour of him that had the foveraigne Command; even of the Kinghimselse. Aniochun gladly hearkened unto this admonition; being jealous of the vertue, that shined brighter than the Majestie of his own fortune. And thereupon he laid afide the determination, which tended more to the advancement of his defires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought upon.

Presently after this, He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a frivolous pompe of ceremony, he went up from the Sea-fide to Ilium; there to doe facrifice to Minerva of Troy. Thence passing over the Aegean Sea, He came to Demetrias. Eurylochus the Magnetian, the same whom the Aetolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they won Demetrias; was now the chiefe man, and Ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Countrimen, in great frequencie, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and tooke it as a figne of good lucke, to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, that the Magnetians found not the like cause of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Arno my formewhat like to that of Xerxes: they faw three hundred ships: of which, no more than fortie were ferviceable for the Warres, with an Armie of tenthousand Foot, five hundred Horfe, and fixe Elephants. The Atolians no fooner heard of his comming than they called a Parliament and made a Decree, whereby they invited him into their country. He knew before that they would fo doe; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his comming to Lamia the £tolians gave him as joyfull entertainment as they could devife. Being brought into their Councell, he made an Oration: wherein he defired them to hold him excufed. that he came not followed with a greater Armie. This was, he faid, in true estimation, a figne of his good will: in that he staid not to make all things ready, but hasted unto their 20 aide, even whilest the season was unfit for navigation. Yet it should not be long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be fatisfied unto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neither would be for any charge, travell, or danger, to follow the bufinesse which he had undertaken: even to drive the Romans and their authority out of Greece; leaving the Country free indeed, and the Aulians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great; so was it his meaning, that all provisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because he would not be any way burdenfome unto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs intreat them, having thus hastily come over unto their aide, unprovided of many necessaries, that they would 30 helpe him with Corne and other victuals, whereof he flood in need. So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was after a little dispute, (for a vaine motion was made by fome, that the differences between the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) That they would yeeld unto the Kings defire, and affift him with all their forces. Here we may observe, how vaine a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himselfe, as did Antiochia, in a businesse of dangerous importance, upon the promifed affurance of a State that is meerely popular. For if the vehemencie of Thoas, and some other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Councell: the Atolians, for gaine of two or three Townes, yea, for hope of fuch gaine that might have deceived them, were like to have abandoned this King their friend, unto the 40 discretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there beene, if this had so fallen out? He could have be morned himself to Thors, and complained of the wrong: but he must have been contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Theas would therefore have pronounced to be very wicked men. It happened much better for the present, though in the future it proved much worse, both for him, and for the Etolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces: and thirty Commisfioners were appointed to be about him, as a Councell of Warre for the Nation. Thefe armed fuch as readily they could, whileft it was in dispute where they should begin the Warre. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first undertaken: whither if they came fuddenly, they should not peradventure need to use much force. The King had o brought with him into Atolia but a thousand Foot, leaving the rest behinde him at Demetrias. With these he hasted away directly toward Chalcie; being overtaken by no great number of the Etolians, which accompanied him thither. At his comming, the Magistrates, and some of the chiefe Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Atolians began, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had onely in words and falle femblance, fet Greece at libertie. But fuch libertie, as might be true and usefull, they faid, would never be obtained; untill by removing the necessity of obeying their pleasure that were most mightie, every severall Estate had where to finde redresse of any pressure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King CHAP.5.$.7.

well able to counterpoise, yea to overweigh the Romans: who neverthelesse desired them onely, so to joyne with him in League, as that if either the Romans or he should offer them wrong, they might keep it in their power, to feek redresse at the others hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedome was not imaginarie, but absolute; for which they were to thanke the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new confederacie. That which they spake of themselves, they could likewise affirme of all the Greeks: forasmuch as none of them paid any Tribute, was kept under by any Garrifor, or lived otherwise than by their owne Lawes, and without being tied unto conditions which displeased them. Wherefore they wondred, why the King should thus trouble to himselfe, to deliver Cities that were already free. But fince he, and the Etolians, requested their friendship; they befought both him and the Etolians, to doe a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leaving them in fuch good cafe as they were. With this answer the King departed: for he was not, as then, strong enough to force them. But very foon after, he brought thither a greater power, which terrefied them and made them yeeld: before all the fuccours could arrive, which Tim had fent for their

The chiefe Citie of Eubaabeing thus gotten, all the rest of the Iland shortly yeelded to Amiochus. Foure or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came over-late to have defended Chalcis, reposed themselves at Delium, a little town of Baoria, lying over against 25 the Hand; where was a Temple and Grove, confecrated unto Apollo, that had the priviledge of an inviolable Sanctuary. In this place were fome of them walking, and beholding the things there to be feen, whilest others were busied as they found cause: without feare of any danger; as being in such a place, and no warre hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus, one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himselfe in many vain Treaties of peace, took advantage of their carelesnesse, and used them with all extremity of war. Very sew of them escaped: fiftie were taken, and the rest slain. Hereat Quinting was grieved: yet so. as it pleased him well to consider that his Romans had now more just cause than before.

to make war upon the King.

Antiochus liked wel these beginnings, and sent Embassadors into all quarters of Greece; 30 in hope, that his reputation should perswade very many to take his part. The wiser fort returned fuch answer, as the Chalcidians had done. Some reserved themselves untill he should come among them: knowing that either, if he came not, he must hold them excufed for not daring to stirre; or, if he came, the Romans must pardon their just feare, in yeelding to the stronger. None of those that lay farre off, joyned with him in true meaning, fave the Eleans, that alwayes favoured the Atolians, and now feared the Acheans. Little reason there was, that he should think to draw the Achaens to his partie. Nevertheleffe he affayed them, upon a vain hope, that the envie which Titus was faid to beare unto Philopæmens vertue, had bred a secret dislike between that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both he and the Atolians sent Embassadours to the Councell at Agium; 40 that spared not brave words, if the Acheans would have beene so taken. The Kings Embaffadour told of great Armies and Fleets that were comming; reckoning up the Dahans, Medians, Elimaans, and Caducians, names that were not every day heard of, & therefore as he thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydomans, Tyrians, Aradians, and Pamphylians were; such indeed as could not be resisted. Now concerning money and all warlike furniture: it was, he faid, well knowne, that the Kingdomes of Asia had alwayes thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceived: who confidering the late warre made against Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would prove the like: the case was too farre different. Yet this most powerfull King, that for the liberty of Greece was come from the utmost parts of the East requested no more 50 of the Achaans, than that they would hold themselves as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whilest he took order with the Romans. To the same effect spake the Æiolian Embassador, and further added, that in the battell at Cynoscephala, neither Titus had done the part of a Generall, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: but that both he and his Army had bin there destroyed, had they not beene protected by vertue of the Atolians, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answer, as could have beene desired. He told the Acheans, That neither the Kings Embaffadour, nor the Aulian, did fo greatly labour to perfwadethose unto whom they addreffed addressed their Orations; as to yount themselves the one unto the other. So as a man might well differen, what good correspondence in vanity it was, that had thus linked the King and the Aetolians together. For even such bragges as here they made before the Acheans, who knew them to be lyars, had the Esolians also made unto King Antiochus: proclaiming the victory over Philip to be meerely their Act: and the whole Countrey of Greece to be dependent on them. Interchangeably had they beene feafted by the King, with fuchtales as his Embassador told even now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimeans, and a many others: that were all but a company of Syrians, fuch as were wont to be fold about for bond-flaves, and good for little elfe. These divers to names of rafcall people were he faid, like to the divertity of Venifon, wherewith a friend of his at Chalcis (no fuch vaunter as were these Embassadors) had sometime seasted him. For all that variety, whereathe wondred, was none other, as his Host then merrily told him; than so many pieces of one tame swine, drest after severall fashions, with variety of fawces. Setting therefore afide this vanity of idle pompe: it were good to make judgement of the great King, by his prefent doings. He had, notwithstanding all this great noyfe, no more than tenne thousand men about him: for which little Army hee was faine in a manner to begge victuals of the Aetolians; and take up money atusurie, to defray his charges. And thus he ranne up and downe the Countrey; from Demetrias to Lamia; thence back to Chalcis; and being there shut out, to Demetrias againe. These were 20 the fruits of lyes: where with, fince both Antiochus and the Ætolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilest wifer men took heed by their example. To a favourable Auditory much perswassion is needless. The Acheans did not love so well the Atolians, as to defire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest abjects. Wherefore they stood not to hearken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Eubaa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed Warre against him, and against the Etolians.

How the hatred betweene these two Nations grew inveterate,; sufficiently appeares in the story foregoing. Now have they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; 30 the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them unwisely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid on the turbulent spirits of the Aerolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Country at rest: there was nothing more greatly to have been defired, than that they might never finde occasion to returne with an Army thither againe. And in this respect ought the Greekes to have sought, not how Smyrna and Lampfacus might recover their liberty (which had never been held a matter worth regarding, untill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, divided and kept afunder by their Countrey, astwo Seas by an Isthmus, or neck of land, might bee kept from overflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their feeking to make free those base Assiques, who originally were 40 Greekifb; than the general applause, wherewith all the nation entertained this their loving offer. Yet were Lystmachia, and the Townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of seare, that should move them to take armes even in their owne defence. But if all Greece would have made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promifing joyntly to affift the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, vvhenfoever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stirre against them: then had not onely this quarrell beene at an end; but the Roman Patronage over the Countrey, had been far from growing, as foon after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Acheans were at this time, in a manner, the only Nation of Greece, that freely and 50 generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactors. All the rest gave doubtfull answers of hope unto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thessalians, were firm against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrell, nor shewed themselves his enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Bastians willingly received him, as foone as he entred upon their borders, not fo much for feare of his power, as in harred of Titus and the Romans, by vvhom they had bin somewhat hardly used. Aminander the Athamanian, besides his old friendship with the Actolians, was caught with a bair, which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an Rrrrr idle-headed man, and vaunted himselse to be descended from Alexander the Great: naming his two fons, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his fifter to the poore Court of Athamania: where having made his folly knowne, by talking of his Pedigree; He was judged by Antiochus and the Etolians, a man fit for their turns. They made him believe, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to doe their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoofe: fince no man had thereto so good title as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto; it behooved him to draw Aminander to their party, that fo they might the fooner have done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleafed herewith; and by perswasions of himself, or of his sister, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of service done by this imaginary King (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzie in hope to get love of the Macedonians that should be his subjects or whether from some vanity in King Antiochus that employed him) vvrought more harm to his friends, than he and Aminander vvere able to do good. There vvere two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched unto Cynofcephala, there to gather up the bones of the flaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had fuffered all this while to lie unburied. The Macedons troubled not themselves to think on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip took it in high indignation: as intended meerely unto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent unto the Romans; and gave them to understand, that he was ready with all his power to aid them wherein foc-20 ver they should be pleased to use him. The Aetolians, Magnetians, Eubaans, Baotians, and Athamanians, having now all jovned with him; Antiochus tooke counsell of them about the prosecution of the Warrein hand. The chiefe question was, Whether it were meet for him to invade Thessalie, that would not hearken to his perswassions; or whether to let all alone until the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Somethought one thing, and some another; confirming each his owne fentence, with the weightieft reasons which he could alledge; as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long been cast aside as avessell of nouse; but was now required to deliver his opinion. Hee freely told the king. That what he should now utter, was even the same which he would have spoken, had his 20 counsell at any time before been asked fince their comming into Greece. For the Magmetians, Baotians, and other their good friends, which now fo willingly tooke their parts: what were they else than formany poore Estates, that wanting force of their owne, did adjoyne themselves for searc unto him, that was strongest for the present; and would afterwards, when they faw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary fide, alledging the same feare for their excuse? Wherefore he thought it most behoovefull to win King Philip of Macedon unto their party: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards have power to recoyle and for fake them at his pleasure) vvas a mighty Prince; and one that had meanes to furtaine the Roman Warre with his proper forces-Now that Philip might be easily perswaded to joyne with them; the benefit likely to re- 40 dound unto himselse, by their society, was a very strong Argument : though indeede what need was there, of proving by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, faid Hee, These Actolians here present; and namely, this Thous, being lately Embassadour from them into Afia, among other Motives which he then used to excite the King unto this Expedition, infisted mainely on the same point. He told us that Philip was moved beyond all patience with the Lordly in solence of the Romans: likening that king to some wilde bealt, that was chained or lockt up within some grate, and would faine break loofe. If this be fo : let ses breake his chaine, and pull downe the grate, that he may regaine his liberty, and satisfie his angry Stomacke, upon those that are common enemies to us and him. But if it prove otherwife, and that his feare be greater than his indignation : then [hall it behoovens to looke unto 50 him; that he may not feeke to please his good masters the Romans, by offending us. Tour some Seleucus is now at Lyfimachia, with part of your Army: if Philip will not hearken to your Embassage; let Seleucus be in readinesse to fall upon Macedon, and finde him work to defend his owne on the other fide without putting us here to trouble. Thus much concerning Phillip; and the present war in Greece. But more generally for the manuaging of this great enterprise, wherein you are now embarqued against the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: Whereto had you then given eare the Romans by this time (bould have beard other newes, than that Chalcis in Eubœa was become ours. Italy & Gaul Should have bin on fire with war; and.

little to their comfort, they should have understood, that Hannibal was againe come into I. taly. Neither doe I fee what should hinder us even now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet and Army bither (but in any case let Ships of burden come along with them, loader with store of victuals: For as the case now stands, we have here too few hands, and too many mouthes.) Wherefore let the one halfe be imployed against Italy; whilest you in person with the other halfe, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affaires of Greece, and therewith all make countenance, as if you were even ready to follow us into Italy: yea, and be ready to follow us indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my advice; who though perhaps I am not very skilfull in all forts of Warre; yet how to war with the Romans, I have been instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine owne. Of this counsell which I give, I promise you my faithfull and diligent service for the execution : but what counsell Toever you please to follow, I wish it may bee prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said he had spoken bravely: but of all this was nothing done; save onely that one was fent into Asia, to make all things ready there. In the meane while they went in hand with Thessaly; about which they had before disputed. There when they had wonne one Towne by force, many other places, doubting their owne strength. were glad to make submission. But Larissa, that was chiefe of the Country, stood out : not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the walls with his whole Army. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M.Babius, a Ro-20 man Proprætor, did send help thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himselfe enemy unto Antiochus; whereby the fame of the fuccour comming to Lariffa, grew fuch, as wrought more than the fuccour could have done, had it arrived . For Antiochus perceiving many fires on the Mountains tops afarre off; thought that a great Army of Romans and Macedonians had been comming upon him. Therefore excusing himselfe by the time of the yeare; He brake up his fiege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in love with a young Maiden, daughter unto a Citizen of the Towne; whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was betweene them, both in years and fortune, He fhortly married; and so spent the Winter following as delightfully as hee could, without thinking upon the War in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his exam-30 ple; and the fouldiers as readily imitated their Captains: in fuch wife, that when he took the field, he might evidently perceive in what loose manner of discipline his Army had paffed the winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Conful, shal meet him very shortly, and help him to reclaime them from this loofenesse of nuptiall Revels; by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The war against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwife He was no way fo honourable, as Nafica his Colleague: unto whom fell a charge, of far leffe credit and importance. Nafica, befides the great Nobility of his Family, had bin long fince, in time of the Punick Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate for very feare and superstiti-40 on, durst not have so pronounced him, had they not so thought him, as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the very best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Divell then taught them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gave such advantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Province; or arrogate more unto himselfe, than his lot should affoord him. This unpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make Warre against the Bojians; wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder service, requiring the more ability in matter of War. But M. Acilius went over into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, and fifteen 50 Elephants. Ptolomy King of Egypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antrochus; and Philip King of Macedon; had lately fent Embassadors to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into £tolia, there to assist the Consul in this War. Ptolomie sent also gold and silver, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But he was too young; and dwelt too sarre off. So his mony was returned unto him with thankes; and his loving offer as lovingly resuled. Unto Philips Embassadors answer was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselves beholding to him, for the assistance that thee should give to Acidius the Reference.

Consull. Masanissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did strive, which of them should bee most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantity of graine; which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Army in Greece. And herein Masanissa far out-went the poor City of Carthage; as also in that he offered to lend the Consul sive hundred Horse, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians Consul sive hundred Horse, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians undertook to set out a Fleet at their owne charges: and to bring in at one payment, all the undertook to set out a Fleet at their owne charges: and to bring in at one payment. Tribute-mony which was behind, and ought to be discharged by many yearly pensions. But the Romans did neither think it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would let them redeeme themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corne, it was accepted to the them of the strip ted, with condition, That they should be contented to receive the price of it. The hastie and ridiculous issue of this War, that began with such noyse and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great between the Roman and the Afiatique fouldier. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acarnania, after the same maner as he had prevailed in other parts of Greece; partly by faire words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terror, that was like to prove their excuse, when they should againe for fake him. But King Philip and B abim having recovered many places; and the Roman Conful being arrived, against whom none made resistance; He was glad to withdraw himselfe. Aminander fled out of his Athamania : which the Macedonian tooke and enjoyed; as in recompence of his good service to the Romans. Philip the brother of Aminanders wife, was taken by the Confull, made a mocking-stock, and sent a- 20 way prisoner to Rome. The The Salians used much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yeelding to the King. All their cities, one after another, gaveup themselves: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding onely for their owne lives, and departing unarmed: yet fo, that a thousand of them stayed behind, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplexe Antiochus; who having withdrawne himselfe to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out upon his friends : and said, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toyle during one halfe of a Winter, and spent the other halfe in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour : after which, in time of need, Hee found all the promises of the Actolians meerely verball: and himselse reduced into termes of great extremity. He therefore admired Hannibal 30 as a wise man, yea, a very Prophet, that had foreseene all this long before. Nevertheleffe, He fent word to the Actolians, that they should now make ready all their forces: as confidering their owne need to be no leffe than his. But the Aetolians had cause to think, that they themselves were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus, who having promised to doe great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill up the same ten thousand which hee first brought over. Yet came there fome of them, though fewer than at any time before, which joined with him. Hereat the King was angry: and could get no better fatisfaction, than that Theas and his fellowes had done their best in vaine, to have made all the Nation take Armes. Since therefore neither his owne men came over to him out of Asia, nor his friends of 40 Greece would appeare in this time of danger : Hee seized upon the Streights of Thermopyla; as meaning to defend them against the Romans, untill more helpe should come. Of the Streights of Thermopyla, there hath beene spoken enough * before, upon many occasions : and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Armie of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily beconceived, how the Romans, that landedabout Apollonia, and so came onwards into Thessaly, were unable to passe that Ledge of Mountaines, dividing the one halfe of Greece; unleffe they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference between Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handfull of men, defended this passage two or three dayes together, against a World of men comming to invade the Country. The latter, having taken upon him to 50 doe great miracles, and effect what he lifted himfelfe in Greece : did commit himfelfe unto the fafety of this place, when he was charged by not many more than he had in his owne Army. There whilest he lay, He sent earnest messengers one after another to the Actolisms, entreating them not to forlake him thus; but at least wife now to helpe, and keepe the toppes of the Mountaines, left the Romans, finding any by-path, should come downe upon him. By this importunity, he got of them two thousand, that undertook to make good the few passages: by which onely and not without extreme difficulty, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consul inlike fort, prepared to force the Streights: without flaying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by ficknesses from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them been Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand mento try whether by any meanes they could get up to the Aetolians. He himselfe encouraged his Army: not onely by telling them with what base conditioned enemies they had to deale: but what rich kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battell. All that night Cate had a fore journey (for what happened unto L. Valerius it is uncertaine, fave onely that he failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skilfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tyred, with climbing up steepie Rocks and crooked waies: He 10 commanded them to repose themselves; whilest Hee, being a very able man of body. tooke in hand the discovery, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himfelfe. After a great deale of trouble, He found at length a path: which he tooke tobe, as indeed it was, the best way leading unto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the fame path till toward break of day. It was a place not hanted, because in time of peace, there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no fuch trouble of climbing; neither had this entrance of the Thermopyla been fo often the Seat of War, as might cause any travellers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best: yet did it lead him to a bogge at the end, which would fuffer him to passe no further. So he staid there untill day-light: by which hee discovered both the Campe of the Greekes underneath him; and some of the Aetolians very neare unto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore fent forth a lufty Crue of his men, whom he thought fitteft for that fervice; and willed them by any meanes to get him some prisoners. This was effected and he thereby understood that these Aetolians were no more than fixe hundred; as also that King Aritiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently set upon the detolians, overthrew them flew a great part of them, and chased the rest, that by slying to their Campe, guided him unto it. The fight was already begun betweene the Armies below: and the Romans, that had eafily repelled the Kings men, and driven them into their Campe, found 30 it in a manner a desperate piece of worke to assault the Campe it selfe, which occupied the whole breadth of the Streights; was notably fortified; and not only defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kind of service; but by Archers and Slingers, that were placed over them on the Hill-fide, and powdred down a flowre of weapons on their heads. But Gato his approach determined the matter. It was thought at first that the Actolians had beene comming to helpe the Kings men: but when the Roman armes and enfignes were discovered, such was the terrour, that none made offer of refi-Rance; but all of them for fook the Camp, and fled. The flaughter was not great: for that the badnesse of the way did hinder the Roman Army from making pursuit. Yet this daies loffe drave Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fied to Chales; and from thence with to the first opportunity, got him back into Asia.

All the Cities that had imbraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and increat for pardon: fetting open their gates; and prefenting themselves unto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Briefely, in few dayes all was recovered that Antiochus had gained : the Aetolians onely flanding out, because they knew not what elfe to doe. Neither did the Conful give them any respite. At his returne from Chalcis, he met with King Philip, that having recovered health, came to joyne with him against Antiochus: over whom fince the victory was already gotten. He did gratulate unto the Romans their good fuccesse; and offered to take part with them in the Actolians Warre. So it was agreed, That the Conful should befrege Heracles; and Philip Lamia; to at the same time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who faine would have taken Lamia before the Conful should come to help him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that used to worke by Myne, were overmuch hindered by the stony ground. Yet was Lamia even ready to be taken when the Conful, having won Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the Ipoile of these towns was a reward unto those than had fought at Thermopyla. Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way queetly. But Aciltus that could fo ill endure to fee Philip in likelihood of thriving by

dy to cafe him of his charge.

CHAP. 5. S. 7.

Polyb.13.

The losse of Heraclea did so affright the Actolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they sent unto King Antiochus presently after his flight: intreating him not to forfake them utterly, but either to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing with-held him from comming in perfon at least wife to helpe them with money and other aide. They prayed him to confider, that this did not onely concerne him in honour; but appertained unto his owne fafety: fince it would be much to his hurt, if the Aetolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any enemies at their backes, might fet upon him in Afia. He confidered well of this, and found their words true. Therefore He delivered unto Nicander, one of their Embassadors, a summe of money, that might serve to defray the charges of the Warre: promising that ere long he would fend them strong aide, both by Land and Sea. Those another of their Embassadors, Hee retained with him: who willingly stayed. that he might urge the King to make his word good. But when Heracles was taken from them; then did the Aetolians lay afide all hope of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made suit unto the Consul to obtaine peace, upon any reasonable Condition. The Confull would fearce vouchfafe to give them audience, but faid, He had other businesse in hand; onely he granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and sent L. Valerins Flaccus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much as they would have delivered unto himselfe. At their comming to Hypata; they began. as men favouring their owne cause, to alledge how well they had deserved of the Romans. Whereto Flacess would not hearken. He told them plainely, That the memory of fuch good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe so even betimes, than to stay till they were reduced into termes of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves unto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect fent Embaffadors to the Conful. This phrase of committing unto the faith; fignified, in their use of it, little else than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans used those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as * yeelding to discretion. Wherefore when the Conful heard them speake in this manner: Hee asked them whether their meaning were a- 30 greeable to their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then faid he, I command you first of all. That none of you prefume to goe into Asia, upon any businesse private or publike: then, That ve deliver up unto me Dicarchus the Aetolian, Menestratus the Epirot, Aminander the Athamanian, and fuch of his Countrimen as have followed him in revolting from us. Whilest he was yet speaking: Phameas the Embassador interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the custome of the Greekes, who had yeelded themselves unto his faith; not unto flavery. What? (faid the Conful) Doe ye stand to plead Custome with mee, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted unto every one of their necks. This did so af- 40 fright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Conful, not to deale thus hardly with them, fince they came as Embaffadors; though fince, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He, nor yet the Appeleti or ordinary Councell of the Nation, were able to fulfill these injunctions; without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause hee entreated yet further ten dayes respite; and had granted unto him Truce for fo long.

This surcesance of Warre, during ten, and other ten daies together, began presently after the taking of Heraclea; when Philip had beene commanded away from Lamia, that else he might have wonne. Now because of the indignity herein offered unto that King, and to the end that he might not returne home with his Army, like one that could not bee trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to have further need of him in the continuance of this Warre: He was desired to set upon the Athamas, and some other petty Nations their borderers, whilest the Consul was busie with the Aetolians; taking for his reward, all that he could get. And hee got in that space all Athamania, Perrhabia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Aetolians, hearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for Warre, yet they could not endure to heare more talke of Peace. And it happened, that Nicander about the same time was come back from Antiochu, with mony & hopefull promifes: the Romans abiding still about Heraclea; & Philip having lately rifen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His money Nicander conveighed into Lamia, by very unufuall dexteritie. But he himfelfe being to paffe further to the Affembly of the Etolians, there to make report of his Embassage; was very much perplexed about this his journey, which lay between the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet he made the adventure: and keeping as farre as he could from the Roman fide, fell upon a Station of Macedonians; by whom he was taken, and led unto their King. He expected no good; but either to be delivered unto the Romans, or used ill enough by Philip. But it 16 feemes, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignitie, of his being fent away from Lamia. For he commanded his fervants to entreat Nicander friendly : and he himselfe being then at supper, did visit him as soone as he rose up: giving him to understand, That the Atolians did now reape the fruits of their own madnesse; for a fruits as they could never hold themselves contented, but would needs be calling strangers into Greece. They had pleafed themselves well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans. and then with King Antiochia; but himself, being their neighbour, they could never well endure. It was now therefore, he faid, high time for them to have regard unto his friendthip, whereof hitherto they had never made any triall: for furely their good affection. one unto the other, would be much more availeable unto each of them, than their mu-20 tuall catching of advantages; whereby they had wrought them felves much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicander to fignific unto his Countrimen; and privately to hold in minde the courtefie which he then did him, in fending him fafe home. So giving him a Convoy to guard him to Hypata, he lovingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicander was alwaies after dutifully affected to the crown of Macedon: fo as in the war of Perfess he made himselfe suspected unto the Romans, and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life. When the Conful understood, that the Lulians refused to make their submission, in fuch wife as he required it: he forthwith meant to profecute the warre against them. without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Nau-30 pastus: whither he therefore directly marched, to try what they could or durst. The flege of Naupattus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceived it: for it was a ftrong City, and well manned. But Action ftood upon point of honour, wherein he thought that he should have beene a loser, by rising from before it without Victory. So he staid there welneere all the following time of his Consulship; whilest the Macedonianking and the Acheans made farre better use of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in fuch places as had revolted unto Antiochu, and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the strong Citie of Demetrias; and with an hastic course of Victory, fubdued the Athamanians and others. The Achaans called to account the Elaans and Messemans: which had long beene addicted to the Atolian side; and followed it in 40 taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gave good words; whereby they faved themfelves from trouble awhile. The Meffenians being more frout, before they were invaded, had none other helpe when the Achaan Prator wasted their Countrey, than to offer themselves unto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they sent word, That at his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that unto the Acheans it was not their meaning to yeeld. A message from Titus to the Achean Prætor, did suffice to call home the Armie, and finish the Warre: as also the peremptorie Command of the fame Titus, caused the Messenians to annexe themselves unto the Achaans, and become part of their Common-weale. Such was now the Majestie of a Roman Embassadour. Tiand did favour the Acheans; yet could not like it wel, that either they or any other should 50 take too much upon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were strong enough to defend it against any of their neighbours. That they should make themfelves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans upon even terms; it was no part of his defire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus; which had once bin Philips, and was afterward given by him to Aminander, who fent a Governor thither. But when Aminander in this present warre, was driven out of his own Kingdome by Philip; then did the Governour of Zacynthus offer to fell the Iland to the Acheans; whom he found ready Chapinen. Tim liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their owne Carvers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to CHAP.5. $.7.

their Enemies; as a reward of the victorie which they had obtained. It was bootleffe to dispute. Whereforethe Achains referred themselves unto his discretion. So he told them, that their Commonwealth was like a Tortoise, whereof Peloponnessu was the shel: and that, holding themselves within that compasse, they were out of danger; but if they would needs be looking abroad, they should lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Having settled things thus in Peloponnesus, he went over to Naupastus: where Glabrio the Confull had laine two moneths, that might have beene farre better fpent. There, whether out of compassion which he had upon the Aciolians, or out of diflike of King Philips thriving fo fast: he perswaded the Conful to grant unto the besieged, and to the whole Nation, to long truce, that they might fend Embaffadors to Rome; 10 and submitting themselves, crave pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupastus was in great danger: else would not the Aerolians have made such earnest fuit as they did unto Tim, for procuring of this favour . But if Glabrio had bin fure to carry it in any short space it may well be thought he would not have gone away without it; fince the winning of that Town, wherein was then the whole floure of the Nation, would have made the promifed submiffion much more humble and fincere. When they came unto Rome, no entreaty could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of these two; That either they should wholly submit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate, Or else pay athoufandtalents, and make neither peace nor war with any, further than as the Romans should give approbation. They had not fo much mony neither could they well hope to be gently 20 dealt withall, if they should give themselves away anto discretion; which what it signified, they now understood. Wherefore they defired to have it fet down, in what points, & how far forth they should yeeld unto the good pleasure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certain answer: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vain artendance.

Whilest the Aetolians were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Conful had little to do in Greece, and therefore took upon him gravely to fet things in order among the tractable Achains. He would have had them to reftore the banished Laced emonians home into their Countrie; and to take the Eleans into the fellowship of their Commonwealth. This the Arbams liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans should be med- 20 dling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the restitution of the banished Lucedamontant: intending to make it an Act of their own meete grace. As for the Eleans, they were loth to be beholding to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Acheans: into whose Corporation they were delirous to be admitted, and faw that they should have their defire, without fuch compulfive mediation.

The Roman Admirall C. Livim, much about the same time, fought a battell at Sea with Polyxemdin, Admirall to the King Annochus. King Eumenes brought help to the Romans though it was not great: and five and twenty faile of Rhodians came after the barrell, when they were following the Chafe. The Kings Fleet was the better of faile; but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquished in 40 fight, was yet out of danger; as foon as he betook himselfe to a speedy retrait.

And fuch end had the first yeers war between King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greeks as had followed the vain hopes of the Aetolians, were glad to excuse themselves by seare; thinking themselves happy when by Embassadors they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie fide, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemy of late unto the Romans, did now fend to granulate this their victorie: and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored unto him Demerities his younger son; whom some sew yeeres they had kept as an hoftage. Also King Prolomie of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victory, sent word how greatly all Afra and Spra were thereby terrefied. In which regard he defired the Senare nor to forellow time; but to fend an Armie, as foon as might be, into Afa: 50 promifing that his affiltance, wherein foever it pleafed them to use it, thould not be wanting. This Protomie was the fonne-in-law of king Antioobia: but he was the friend of fortime. He understood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the contention, that the Romans were like to have the upper hand. The fame did Antiothm now begin to Tufpect, who had thought hamfelfe a white as fafear Ephelia, as if he had bin in another world: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not fo far out of Greece into Afia, as our of Tralyinto Greece; and that there was no doubt but the Romans would from be there, and make him trie the chance of a battell for his kingdome. 6.VIII.

&. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius the African his elder brother, for his Lieutenant, is Sent into Greece. He grams long Truce to the Atolians, that so he might at leisure passe into Asia. Much troublesome businesse by Sea, and drivers fights. An invasion upon Eumenes his Kingdome; with the fiege of Pergamsu, rayfed by an handfull of the Achaans. L. Scipio the Conful comes into Afia: where Antiochus most earnestly desireth peace, and is denied it. The battell of Magnesia: wherein Antiochus being vanquished, yeeldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The conditions of the peace. In what fort the Romans used their vi-Horie L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous triumph over Antiochus, is surnamed The Afracique as his brother was stiled The African.

ucim Cornelius Scipio, the brother of P. Scipio the African, was chosen Conful at Rome with C. Laline. Laline was very gracious in the Senate: and therefore being defirous (as generally all Confuls were) of the more honourable employment of fered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelin would be so pleased, the disposition of their Provinces, without putting it to the hazzard of a Lottery. Lucius having talked with his brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time bin put unto the Fathers: who therefore were the more defirous to make an unblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent, P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the war against Aniochm, He himselfe would follow his brother in that war, as his Lievtenant. These words were heard with such approbation, that the controversie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied upon Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captain, what better mancould they oppose, than Scipio that had bin victorious against that same Great Worthy: But indeed a worser man might have served well enough the turn. For Hannibel had no absolute Command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in consultation: where his wisedome was 30 much approved, but his liberty and high fpirit as much difliked. It is worthy of remembrance, as a figne of the freedome that he used in his censures, even whilest he lived in such a Court. Aniochus mustered his Armie in presence of this famous Captain: thinking, as may feem to have made him wish, that he had bin served by such brave men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horses, and Elephants, with such costly furniture of gold, filver, and purple, as glittered with a terrible bravery on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the King, well pleasing himselfe with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans . Enough (faid Hannibal) were the Romans the most covetous men in all the world : meaning, that all his cost upon the backs of cowardly Afiatiques, was no better than a fpoyle to animate good Souldiers. How little this answer pleased the king, it is easie to ghesse. The little use that he made of this Carthaginian, testifies that his dislike of the man, caused him to lose the use of his service, when he stood in greatest necessity thereof.

The Scipio's made all haste away from Rome as soon as they could. They carried with them, besides other Souldiers newly prest to the war, about five thousand Voluntaries, that had served under P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirty Quinquereme Gallies, and twenty Triremes newly built appointed unto L. & milius Regillus, that was chofen Admirall the fame yeere for that voyage. At their comming into Greece, they found the old Conful Glabrio belieging Amphylla a City of the Leolians. The Aerolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once againe at Naupastu. Wherefore to they not onely fortified that Towne, but kept all the paffages thereto leading; which heedlefly, as in a time of confusion, they had left unregarded the last yeere. Glabrio knowing this, deceived their expectation, and fell upon Lamia: which being not long fince much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the fudden; was carried at the second assault. Thence went he to Amphyssa: which he had almost gotten, when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirteene thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphy fa was presently for saken by the Inhabitants: but they had a Caftle, or higher Town, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embassadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalfe of the Aero-

lians: entreating him to stand their friend, and helpe them in obtaining some tolerable Condition of peace. He gave them gentle words, and willed them to perswade the £tolians, that they should faithfully and with true meaning defire it. This was gladly taken. But many messages passing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Confull made still the same answer, with which they had bin chased from Rome. The Conclusion was, That they should sue for a longer time of respite from war: whereby at more leisure they might attend some better disposition of the Senates or any helpfull commoditie which time should affoord. So they obtained halfe a yeeres truce: after which, the winter was like to affoord them another half yeers leifure of breathing. Hereof were they not more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time loft, 10 which with-held the War from passing over into Asia.

The businesse of Aetolia being thus laide aside, and the old Confull Glabrio sent home into Italy, the Scipio's marched into Thessaly; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace unto the Hellespom . Yet they considered, That hereby they must commit themselves unto the loyaltie of King Philip: who might either do them some mischiese by the way, if he were disposed to watch a notable advantage : or at the least, would he be unfaithfull; though he were not so couragious, yet might he take fuch order with the Thracians, that even for want of victuals, if by no greater inconvenience, they should be disgracefully forced to returne. He had promised them the utmost of his furtherance: wherein, whether he meant fincerely, they thought to make fometriall, by caufing a Gentlemanto ride Post unto him, and observe his doings as he should take him on the sudden. The King was merry at a feast, and drinking, when the Messenger came: whom he lovingly bade welcome; and shewed him the next day, not only what provision of victuals he had made for the Army, but how he had made bridges over the rivers, and mended the bad wayes by which they were to passe. With these good newes Gracches returned backe in haste unto the Scipio's: who entring into Macedon, found all things in a readinesse, that might helpe to advance their journy. The King entertained them royally, and brought them on their way, even to the Hellespont ? where they stayed a good while untill their Navie was in readinesse to transport them in-

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this yeere; though, for the most part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admirall of Antiochus, was a banished Rhodian: trueto the King; and defirous of revenge upon his Country-men, that had expelled him. He, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes having not as yet put to Sea, thought to doe somewhat upon those that were so early in their diligence, before their fellowes should arrive to helpethem. Yet went he crastily to worke, and sent word, as in great secrecie, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requirall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was believed: and the Rhodian Admirall grew so careleffe, expecting still when he should receive a watch-word from Polyxenidas, that 40 he himselse was taken by Polyxenidas in his owne Haven. The Kings Fleet setting forth from Ephesus by night; and, for feare of being discovered, resting one day in harbour by the way, came the fecond night to Samos: where, by morning, it was ready to enter the Haven. Paulistrains the Rhodian Admirall seeing this, thought it his best way of refistance, to bestow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Haven; so to guard the mouth of it: for that he saw no likelihood of defending himselfe by Sea. But Poixenidas had already landed some Companies in another part of the Iland: which falling upon the backe of Paulistrain, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboord. This could not be without great confusion: so as the enemies tooke him out of all order, and funke or boorded all his Navie, five excepted, that by a fudden de- 50 vice made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Crescent upon two poles, at the Beake-head; and then rowed forwards directly upon the Enemie: who having not bethought himselse what shift to make against such unexpected danger of firing, was content to give way unto these desperate Gallies; for feare lest they should burn, together with themselves, a part of the Kings Fleet.

Not long after this, the Romans had some losse by tempest: whereof Polyxenidas could not take such advantage as he had hoped; because, putting to Sea for that purpose, hee was driven backe againe by the like foule weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they were not discouraged, set forth twenty other Gallies: the Romans also with King Eumenes, repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great bravery, presented battell to Polywenidas before the Haven of Ephesia. When he durst not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as either they were entreated by the Rhodians, or perswaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet persormed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindred by stormes at Sea; and another while by strong resistance made against them at Land.

Eumenes with his Flect was compelled to for fake them; and returne home to the defence of his owne Kingdome. For Antiochus wasted all the grounds about Elegand Per-10 gamus: and leaving his fonne Seleucus to befiege the royall City of Pergamus: did yvith thereft of his Army spoyle the vyhole Countrey thereabout. Attalus, the brother of king Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; having with him no better men to defend the City. than yvere they that lay against it. Wherefore he had reason to stand in feare; being too much inferior in number. There came to his aid a thousand Foot, and an hundred Horse of the Achaens: old fouldiers all, and trained up under Philopamen, vvhofe Scholler, in the art of war, Diophanes their Commander vvas. This Diophanes, beholding from the wals of Pergamus, which was an high Town, the demeanour of the enemy; began to disdain that fuch men as they should hold them besieged. For seleucus his army which was encamped at the hill-foot, seeing that none durst fally forth upon them, grew so carelesse: as otherwife than by fpoyling all behind their backes, they feemed to forget that they were in an enemies country. Diophanes therfore spake with Attalus: and told him that he yould go forth to visit them. Aualus had no liking to this adventure; for he said, that the march was nothing equal. But the Achaan would needs have his will and iffung forth, encamped not far from the enemy. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the befiegers, they wondred at first what his meaning was: but when they saw that he held himfelf quiet, they made a jeft of his boldnesse; & laughed to see with what an handful of men he looked fo froutly. So they returned unto their former negligence & diforders. Which Diophanes perceiving. He commanded all his mento follow him, even as fast as they well might: &he himself, with the hundred horse, brake out on the sudden upon the station that was next at hand. Very few of the enemies had their Horses ready sadled, but more few. or none had the hearts to make refistance: so as he drave them all out of their Camp; and chased them as farre as he might safely adventure, with great slaughter of them, and no losse of his owne. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (vvho had covered the walls of the Towne, men and women, to behold this spectacle) vvere very joyfull; and highly magnified the vertue of these Acheans. Yet would they not therefore iffue forth of their gates, to helpe the Achaans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Seleneus encamped halfe a mile further from the Towne, than he had done before: and against him event forth Diophanes the second time; who quietly rested a while in his old Station. When they had stayed many houres, looking vvho should begin: Seleucus, infaire order as he came, withdrew himselfe toward his lodging that was further off Diophanes moved not whilest the Enemie was in fight: but as soone as the ground between them hindred the prospect, hee followed them in all haste, and soone overtaking them with his Horse, charged them in Rere; so as hee brake them, and with all his forces pursued them at the heeles, to their very Trenches. This boldnesse of the Achaens, and the baseneffe of his own men, caused Seleucon to quit the siege, little to his honour. Such being the qualitie of these Asiatiques, Philopæmen had cause to tell the Romans, That he envied their victory. For when Antiochus lay feafting at Chalcis after his marriage, and his fouldiers betook themselves to Riot, as it had bin in a time of great security: a good man of war might havecut all their throats, even as they were tipling in their victualling houses; which Philopamen faid that he would have done, had he bin Generall of the Achains, and not, as he then was, a private man.

Antiochus was full of businesse: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deale of travell, brought almost nothing to passe. He had beene at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did put himselfe with a few of his Horse and light armature. Before Pergamu he left his fon, as before hath beene shewed, and went to Elea: whither he heard that Amylius the Roman Admirall was come to bring succor to Eumenes. There he made an Overture of peace: about which to confult, Eumenes was sent for by Emilia, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul: this Treatie brake off. Then followed CHAP. 5. 5.8.

the overthrow newly mentioned; which caused Selenem to give over the siege of Pergamu. Afterwards, foure or five Townes of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King: and the Syrian Fleet, being of feven and thirty Saile, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victorie the Rhodians had no great cause to rejoyce: for that Hannibalthe Caribaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochen, was Admirall of the Syrians, did them in a manner as great hurr as they could doe to Apollonius; and having the victory taken out of his hands by Apollonius his flight. vet made such a retrait, that the Rhodians durst not faire adventure upon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Prefaces unto the warre, the last and greatest was a vi-Clory of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admirall. The battell was fought by Myonnesus a Promontorie in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him fourescore and nine Gallies; and five of them greater than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those brags, wherewith Antiothen vaunted the last yeere, That his Armada should cover all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fiftie Gallies; the Rhodeans two and twenty: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned the Rhodian more light-timbred and thin planckt, having all advantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to helpe themselves by the same device, with which five of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran upon the enemy : who declining them for feare, laid open his fide: and was thereby in greater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Navie hoysted saile: and, having a faire wind, bore away toward Ephelin as falt as they could . Yet forty of their Galllies they left behind them: whereof thirteen were taken, all the rest burnt or sunke. The Romans and their fellowes lost only two or three ships: but got hereby the absolute Masterie of the

The report of this missadventure, may seeme to have taken from Anisochus all use of reason. For as if no hope had bin remaining to detend those places that he held in Europe, he presently with drew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily have beene kept, even till the end of Winter following, and have reduced the besiegers (if the siege had been continued obstinately) unto termes of great extremity. He also gave over the 30 siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thought save onely of defence, drew together all his Armie; and sent for helpe to his Father-in-law, King Ariarashes the Cappado-

Thus the Roman Confull, without impediment, not onely came to the Hellespont, but had yeelded unto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was then also in a readinesse to transport him over into Asia: where Eumenes had taken finch care before, that he landed quietly at his owne good eafe; even as if the Countrie had been his already. The first newes that he heard of the Enemie, was by an Embalfadour that came to fue for peace. This Embaffador declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtaining peace of the Romans hereto-40 fore, did now perswade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampsacu, and Lysimachia, had beene the places about which they varied. Sceing therefore the King had now already given over Lysimachia, and was further purposed, not to strive with the Romans about Lampsacus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should need to trouble him with warre? If it was their defire, that any other Townes upon the Cost of Afia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, flould be also set at libertic, or otherwise delivered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take fome part of Afia: To as the bounds, dividing them from the King, might not be uncertaine, and it should be quietly put into their hands. If all this were not enough, the 50 King would likewife beare halfethe charges, whereat they had been in this Warre. So praying the Romans to hold themselves contented with these good offers, and not to be too infolent upon confidence of their fortune, he expected their answer. These offers which to the Embaffador feemed fo great, were judged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should be are all the charges of the warre, fince it began through his owne fault: and that He should not onely depart out of those few Townes, which he held in Folis and Ionia, but quite out of Afiathe leffe, and keep himselfe on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Embassadour therefore saw, that no better bargaine could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in private and to him he promifed a great quantitie of gold, together with the free reftitution of his fonne; who (it is uncertaine by what mifchance) was taken prifoner, and most honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwise to the reftitution of his fonne, than upon Condition, That it might be with making such amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the publique businesse: He onely said thus much, That since Amiochus had already sorsaken Lysimachus, and suffered the warre to take hold on his owne Kingdome; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, said he, tell your to King in my name, that I would advise him to resuse no Condition whereby he may

The King was not any whit moved with this advice. For feeing that the Conful demanded of him no lesse, than if he had beene already subdued: little reason there was that he should feare to come to battaile; wherein he could lose, as he thought, no more. than by feeking to avoid it he must give away. He had with him threescore and tenne thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse's besides two and fifty Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with hookes or fythes, according to the manner of the Easterne Countries. Yet was he nothing pleased to heare that the Confull drew neere him apace. as one hastning to fight. But how soever he was affected; He made so little shew of search 20 that hearing P. Scipio to lie ficke at Elaa, He fent thither unto him his fon without ranfome: as one both defirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his fickneffe, and withall not defirous to retaine the young Gentleman for a pledge of his owne fafetie. Thus ought his bountie to be conftant. Otherwife it might be suspected, That herein hee dealt craftily. For fince he could have none other ransome of Scapio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great flore of wealth, might pay better it was to doe fuch a courtefie before the battell, as would afterwards have been elittle worth; than to flay untill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recoverie of his fonne: fo as the joy thereof was thought to have beene much availeable unto his health. In recompense of the Kings humanitie, Hee 30 faid onely thus much unto those that brought him this acceptable Present, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by advising him not to fight untill he Shall beare that I am in the Campe. What he meant by this, it is hard to conjecture. Antiochus resolved to follow his counsaile: and therefore withdrew himselfe from about Thyatira, beyond the River of Phrygius or Hyllus, unto Magnefia by Sipylus: where encamping. He fortified himselfe as strongly as he could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Conful, and fate downe within foure miles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greeks, came to bid the Romans welcome of whom at first they slew some; and were anon, with some losse, driven backe over the River. Two daies were quietly from , whileft neither the King nor the Romans would passe the water. The third day the Romans made the adventure: wherein they found no disturbance; nor were at all opposed, untill they came within two miles and a halfe of Antiochus his Campe. There as they were taking up their lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foote: whom the ordinary Corps de garde repelled. Foure dayes together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and fet them in order before the Trenches, without advancing any further. The fift day the Romans came halfe way forward, and prefented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Confull tooke advice what was to be done. For either they must fight upon what soever disadvantage, or else resolve to abide by it all Winter, farre from any Countrey of their friends, and therefore subject unto many difficulties : unlesse they 50 would staine their honour by returning farre backe, to winter in a more convenient place; and so defer the warre untill the next Spring. The Roman Souldier was throughly perswaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the Generall Crie, That this great Army should be assailed, even in the Campe where it lay: as if rather there were fo many beafts to be flaughtered, than men to bee fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discovering the fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set upon him. All this while P. Scipze came nor. Wherefore the King, being loth to dishearten his men, by seeming to stand in feare of the Enemie, resolved to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans tooke the field againe, and ordered their Battells: SIIII

CHAP. 5. 8.8.

Hee also did the like; and advanced so farre, that they might understand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Army confisted of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were five thousand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as usually, were in the points: the Romans, in the meane battell. All of them, according to their wonted forme. were divided into Maniples. The Hastari had the leading: after them follow the Principes, at fuch distance as was usuall; and last of all, the Triarii. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries; partly Achaans, and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equal Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Urmost of all (save some five hundred Creisans, and of the Trallians) were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the River: yet foure Troups of Horse were placed there, though such helpe seemed in a manner needlesse. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Conful had with him fixteene African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rere: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they onely would have served to discourage his men; as being fure to bee beaten: the Indian being farre the greater. and more courageous beaftes: whereof Antiochus had likewise much advantage in number.

The Kings Army being compounded of many Nations, diverfly appointed, and not 20 all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the severall kindes, in fuch wife as each might be of most use. The maine strength of his Foot consisted in fixteene thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These he placed in the middest, and divided into tenne Bartalions: every one having two and thirty in File. and fifty in Front. Betweene every Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beaftes. and fuch as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their backes, and befides him that governed the Elephant, foure men in every Tower, made a gallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these were fifteene hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greeks: then, three thousand Barbd Horse : and a Regiment of almost a thousand horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrie, and accompanied by some others. All which Troups of Horse, divided in their severall kindes, doe seeme to have followed one another in depth, rather than to have bin stretched our in Front. Adjovning unto these, were fixeteene Elephants together in one flocke. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings owne Regiment; called the Argyraspides, or Silversbields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like fo valiant as those of the same name, that had served under Great Alexander: then, twelve hundred Archers on horsebacke, three thousand light-armed Foot, two thousand and five hundred Archers of Mysia; with foure thousand Slingers and Archers of the Cirtaans, and Elymeans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greeks, and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand horse that were sent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seven hundred of divers Nations; and a Regiment of a thousand Horsemore lightly armed, that were called The Kings Troup, being Syrians, Phrygians. and Lydians. In front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with hooks or sythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon fate Arabians with long Rapiers, that would ferve to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rable of many Nations , Carians , Cicilians , Pamphylians , Pifidians , Cyrtaans , Elymaans , and many others, having also with them fixteen Elephants. Antiachus him selse commanded in the right wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principall Captains commanded over the Phalangiers.

The first on-set was given by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the 50 one, being like to terrefiethe Horse; the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foot; Eumenes with a sew light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatned by them both. For with shortings, and noises, and some wounds, they were driven out of the field, and running backe upon their owne men, did the same harme which they had intented to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this advantage, charged upon the left wing: whereas they found no resistance; some being out of order; others, being without courage. It is shameful to rehearle, and so strange, that it may hardly seeme credible; that the Phalangiers, with such varietie of Auxiliaries, made little or no resistance; but all of them fled, in a manner, as soone as they were charged. Onely the King, Antiochus himselse; being in the left wing of his owne battaile: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite unto him; weakly slanked with Horse: gave upon them courageously, and forced them to retire. But M. Amilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, issued forth with all his power to helpe his fellowes: and, what by persuasion, what by threats, made them renew the sight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Romans were already victorious: whereof when Antiochus discovered the approach; He not onely turned his Horse about, but ranne away upon the spur without surther tarriance. The Campe was to desended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is said to have lost in this battaile sifty thousand Foot, and source thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not slaine above three hundred Foot, and source and twenty Horse: of Eumenes his followers sive and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Anamea, the fame night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thicher before. He left the custody of Sardes, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Townef-men and Souldiers were fo diffnaved with the greatnesse of the Overthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in those parts, without expecting summons, yeelded up themselves by Embas-20 fadours: whom they fent to the Romans, whileft they were on the way. Neither were many dayes spent, ere Antiochus his Embassadour was in the Campe : having none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose upon the King his Master. P. Scipzo was now come to his brother, who obtained leave to make the answer, because it should bee gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, that he should quite abandon his Dominions on this side Taurus. For their charges in that Warre, they required fifteene thousand Talents: five hundred in hand; two thousand and five hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should have confirmed the peace; and the other twelve thousand, in twelve yeeres next ensuing, by even portions. Likewise they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes; and some 30 store of Corne, that was due to him upon a reckoning. Now besides twenty hostages which they required, very earnest they were to have Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoas the Liolian, with some others who had stirred up the King to this warre, delivered into their hands. But any wife man might fo eafily have perceived, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demands; as no great are was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embaffadour had full commission, to refuse nothing that should be enjoyed. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to fend immediatly to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Confuls chosen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fulvius, & Cn. Manlins Volso. The £tolians desired peace, but could not obtaine it: because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Consuls should make warre upon the £tolians; the other, upon Antio-chuin in Asia. Now though shortly there came newes that Antiochui was already vanquissed in battaile, and had submitted himselfe unto all that could be required at his hands: yet since the State of Asiawas not like to be so throughly settled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care; Cn. Manlins, to whom Asia fell by lot, had not his Province changed:

Soone after this, came the Embassadours of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and some others; yea, by King Eumenes in person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the businesse in hand. Concerning the peace to be made with 50 King Antiochus, there was no disputation: it was generally approaved. All the trouble was, about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned up his own deserts; and comparing himselfe with Masanissa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountifull to him than they had beene to the Numidian, since they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masanissa was onely such in title; and since both he and his Father had alwayes beene their friends, even in the worst of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much adoe to make him tell what hee would have: He still referring himselfe to their courtesse; and they desiring him to speake plaine. At length he eraved that they would bestow upon him, as much of the Country by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keepe in their owne hands. Neither thought he it needfull, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giving liberty to many of the Greeke Towns, that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Towns had been partakers with the King in his Warre; it was no reason that they should be gainers by his overthrow. The Rhodians did not like of this. They defired the Senate to be truely Patrons of the Greecan liberty; and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece it selfe had bin subject unto Philip, and served him in his War: which was not alledged against them as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the maine point whereon they insisted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against King Aniochus was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to 10 heare of this; and very bountifully gave away so much, that every one had cause to be Such end had the Warre against King Antiochu: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted unto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe whereof exceeded in riches, not only that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld untill that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had been given unto P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the title of the Assaique: which the fortune of his Victory had no lesse deserved; though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

The £tolians, and the Gallo-Greeks, vanquished by the Roman Confuls Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtaines a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to have passed the bounds appointed as fatall to the Romans by Sybil. Of Sybils Prophesies; the Bookes of Hermes; and that Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's: and that beginning and faction among the Roman Nobility.

Arc. Fulvius and Cn. Manlius had the same charge divided betweene them, 30 which L. Cornelius Scipio, now styled Asiaticus, had lately undergone. It was found more than one mans worke, to looke at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted solong a Truce to the Etolians. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughtie little Nation had not sought to humble it selfe to the Roman Majessie, it was now to be brought unto more lowly termes than any other of the Greeks. The best was, that so great a storme fell not unexpected upon the Etolians. They had foreseene the danger, when their Embassadours were utterly denied peace at Rome; and they had provided the last remedy; which was, to entreate the Rhodians and Athenians to become intercessours for them. Neither were they so dejected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well dequise, even upon helping themselves, by repurchase of Countries lost, where they spied advantage.

Poore King Aminander lived in exile among them, whilft Philip of Macedon kept for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Athamanians (besides that many of them bore a natural affection to their owne Prince) having beene long accustomed to ferve a Mountaine Lord, that converfed with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and infolent manner of command, used by the Captaines of Philip his Garrifons. They fent therefore some few of them to their King, & offered their service towards his restitution. At the first there were onely foure of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which undertooke the worke. Yet, affu-50 rance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. He was at the borders with a thousand Ætolians, upon the day appointed: at what time his two and fifty adventurers, having divided themselves into source parts, occupied, by the ready affiftance of the multitude, foure of the chiefe Towns in the Countrie, to his use. The fame of this good successe at first; with divers letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their best in helping forward the Action, made the Lievtenantsof Philip unable to thinke upon refistance. One of them held the Towne of Theium a few dayes; giving thereby some leisure unto his King to provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was loft. Thilip had brought from home fixe thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, he left all fave two thousand behinde him, and so came to Athaneum, a little Athamanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium a while, to take a placelying over Argainea, that was chiefe of the Countrie. Zeno did ashe was appointed : yet neither he, nor the King had the boldeness to descend upon Argithea; for that they might perceive the Athamanians, all along the hill fides, ready to come downe upon them, when they should be busic. 10 Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a fafe retrait: especially when Aminander came in fight with his thousand Etolians. The Macedonians were called backe, from-wards Argithea, and prefently withdrawn by their King towards his owne borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure. The Athamanians and Aetolians way-laid them, and pursued them so closely, that their retrait was in manner of a plaine flight, with great loffe of men and armes, few of those escaping, that were left behinde, as to make a countenance of holding fomewhat in the Countrey, untill Philip his returne.

The Aetolians having found the businesse of Athamania so easie, made an attempt in their owne behalfe, upon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. These had belonged unto their Nation, & were lately taken by Philip; from whom they diligently revolted, and became Aetolian againe. The Dolopians lay next; that had been ever belonging to the Maccaonian, and so didstill purpose to continue. These tooke Armes at first: but soone layed them away; seeing their neighbours ready to sight with them in the Aetolian quarrell, and seeing their owne King so hastily gore, as if he meant not to returne.

Of these victories the joy was the lesse; for that newescame of Antiochia his last overthrow, and of M. Fulcim the new Confull his hasting with an Armie into Greece. Aminander fent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate not to take it in despight, that he had recovered his owne from Philip with fuch helpe as he could get. Neither feemes it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his losses: for of this fault they 30 neither were sharpe correctors, nor earnest reprovers. Fulvius went in hand with the businesse, about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly City, that had beene the chiefe feate of Pyrrhu his Kingdome. With this he began, for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Aeiolians: yet could not by them be relieved, unlesse they would adventure to fight upon equal ground. To help the Ambracians, it was not in the Atolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at fea, and ready to be driven from their new conquest, by Perseus the sonne of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were unable to deale with formany at once; and therefore as earneftly fought peace with the Romans, as they flourly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embaffadours came; who befought the Confull to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not bee terresied, by any violence of the Affailants, or danger that might feeme to threaten. The Confull had no defire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and so bee driven to leave unto his fucceffour the honour of finishing the Warre. Wherefore hee gladly hearkened unto the Atolians, and bade them feeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it overdeare, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Anisothus had made the same purchase. He also gave leave to Aminander, offering his fervice as a mediatour, to put himfelfe into Ambracia, and trie what good his perswasions might doe with the Citizens. So, after many demaunds and excuses, the 50 conclusion was fuch as was grievous to the weaker, but not unsufferable. The same Embaffadours of the Athenians and Rhodians, accompanied those of the Etolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made a very grievous complaint about the loffe of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it did not hinder the peace, which those good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly solicite. The Etolians were bound to uphold the Majestie of the people of Rome, and to observe divers Articles, which made them the leffe free, and more obnoxions to the Romans, than SIIII 3 any people of Greece; they having been the first that called these their Masters into the Countrie. The Ile of Cephalema was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselves (as not long since they had gotten Zacynthus from the Achaans, by stiffely pressing their owne right) that so they might have possession along the coast of Greece. whileft they feemed to forbeare the Countrey. But concerning those places, whereto Philap, or others, might lay claime, there was fet down an Order fo perplexed, as would neceffarily require to have the Romans Judges of their controversies, when they should arife. And hereof good use will be shortly made: when want of employment elsewhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, upon the affaires of Macedon

Cn. Manlius, the other Confull, had at the same time warre in Asia, with the Gallo-Greeks and others. His Armie was the same that had followed L. Scipio; of whose victorie, his acts were the confummation. He visited those Countries on the hither side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Amiochus. Among these there were some petty Lords, or Tyrants, some free Cities, & some that were together at Warres, without regard of the great alteration that hapned in Asia. From every of these hee got somewhat; and by their quarrells found occasion to visite those Provinces, into which he should else have wanted an errand. He was even loaden with booty, when, having fetcht a compasse about Asia, he came at length upon the Gallo- Greeks. These had long domineered over the Countrie: though of late times, it 20 was rather the fame & terror of their fore-passed acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them up in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such triall, when they ferved under King Antiochus, as made them to acknowledge themselves farre the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safetie, that they dwelt upon the River Halys, in an In-land Countrie, where those enemies were not very like to fearch them out. But when fuch hopes failed; and when fome Princes of their owne Nation; that had beene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yeeld: then was no counfaile thought fo good, as to forfake their houses and Countrey, and, with all that they could carry or drive, to betake themselves unto the high mountaines of Olympus and Margana. These mountaines were exceeding hard of ascent, 30 though none should undertake the custodie. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as also the naturall strength being helpt, by such fortification as promised greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Consult would either forbeare the attempt of forcing them, or eafily be repelled, and that finally, when he had stayed there a while, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this availed not. For whereas the Gallo-Greeks had beene carelesse of furnishing themselves with casting weapons, as if stones would have served well enough for that purpose: the Romans, who came farre otherwise appointed, sound greater advantage in the difference of Armes, than impediment in disadvantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did eafily prevaile against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gallo-Greeks, 40 neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor having prepared their stones before-hand, but catching up what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit fize. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defensive Armes, could not hold out against the Arrowes and weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driven from a piece of ground, which they had undertaken to make good, up into their Campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to cast themselves headlong downe the steepe rockes. Few of the men escaped alive : all their wives, children, and goods became a prey unto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation overcome soone after, at the other mountaine: onely more of them faved themselves by flight, as having fairer way at 50 their backes.

These warres being ended: Fulvius and Manlius were appointed by the Senate cach of them to retaine as Proconfull, his Province for another yeere. Fulvius, in his fecond yeer, did little or nothing. Manlius gave peace to those whom he had vanquished; as likewife to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and fome others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for feare of the Roman armes. He drew from them all, what profit he could: and laid upon them fuch conditions, as he though expedient. He also did finish the league of peace with Antiochus; whereto hee swore, and received the Kings oath by Embassadours, whom he sent for that pur pose. Finally, having set in order the matters of Asia, he tooke his way toward the Hellespont, loaden with spoile, as carrying with him (befides other treasures) all that the Gallo-Greeks had in so many yeers extorted, from the wealthy Provinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Army of Manlius returne home, rich in money alone, or cattell, or things of needfull use, which the Roman Souldier had beene wont to take as the onely good purchase; but furnished with fumptuous houshold-stuffe, and slaves of price, excellent Cookes, and Musicians for banquets, and in a word, with the feedes of that luxurie, which finally over-grew and choked the Roman vertue.

The Country of Thrace lay between Hellespont & the Kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his journey homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any such booty as might provoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stirre. But when Manlius came along with a huge traine Liv. lib. 30, of baggage; the Thracians could not fo wel contain themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philip tooke it otherwise than very pleasantly, to have this Roman Army robbed, & well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry seeing how little himselfe was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he understood, and afterwards gave the Romans to understand, that Eumenes could not have abidden in his owne King-20 dome, if the people of Kome had not made warre in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered unto himselfe three thousand talents, and fiftie ships of warre, to take part with him and the Atolians, promifing moreover to restore unto him all the Greeke Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the warre began: he thought it no even dealing of the Romans, after their victory, to give away not onely the halfe of Afia, but Chersennesus, & Lysimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas upon himselfe they bestowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeed with his Nobility to goe to Rome and begge Provinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. He had entertained lovingly the two Scipio's, whom he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was grown into neer 30 acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby he made himselfe acquainted with the warres in Spaine and Africke. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes tooke a surer way. For the Scipio's had not the disposing of that which they wonne from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates affifting him : but the Senate of Rome. by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore faw these upstart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, advanced fo highly, and made greater than himselfe; yea himselfe unregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish, that he had not so hastily declared himselfe against Antiochus, or rather that he had joyned with Antiochus and the Ætoleans, by whom he might have beene freed from his infolent Masters. But what great argument of fuch discontentedness the Macedonian had, we shall very shortly be urged to discourse more at large. At the present it was believed, that the Thacians were by him feton, to affaile the Romans passing through their Country. They knew all advantages; & they fell, unexpected, upon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midst of the Armie; whereof part had already passed a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet fo farre advanced. There was enough to get, and the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the bootie, as was to their 50 full content. And of fuch trouble there was more, though leffe dangerous, before the Armie could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdome they had a faire march into Epiriu; and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

enough to leave behinde: though both the getting and the faving, did cost many lives, as well of the Barbarians, as of the Romans. They fought untill it grew night and then

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the Citie, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius, whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to affift him, did very bitterly taxe, as an unworthy commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it sufficeth that he made good answer, and was approved by the chiefe of the Senate. One clause is worthy of more particular confideration. Reprehending his defire to have hindred the peace with Antiochus;

they faid, That with much ado he was kept from leading his Army over Taurus, and adventuring upon the calamity threatned by Sibyls verses, unto those that should passe the fatall bounds. What calamity or overthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophecie threatned the Roman Captaine or Armie, that should passe over Taurus, I doe not conceive. Pomper was the first, that marched with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened unto him the way, & had before-hand won, in a fort, the Countries on the other fide of the Mount; which Lucullus gave to one of Antiochus his race. though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accomplishment of this prophecie, fell out necre about one time, with the re- 10 stitution of Ptolomy King of Egypt, that was forbidden unto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seeme to have had referenceunto the same things, that were denounced, as like to happen upon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth , and were not , as Tullie noteth , fowed at randome in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by event . I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Prolomy to his Kingdome by Gabinius the Roman, should have any way betokened the comming of our Saviour: as fome both ancient and moderne Christian Writers have beene well pleased to interpret sibyl in that prophecie. Of the Sibylline predictions, I have sometimes thought reverently: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke few men know) yet following 20 the common beliefe and good authority. But observation of the shamefull Idolatry, that upon all occasions was advanced in Rome by the bookes of Sibyl, had well prevailed upon my credulity, and made me suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the judgement of Enfebine: when that learned and excellent worke of Master Casaubon upon Annal, Barataio. the Annales of Cardinall Baronius, did altogether free me from mine errour; making it apparent, That not only those prophecies of Sibyl, wherein Christ so plainly was shewed, but even the bookes of Hermes, which have borne fuch reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whosoever devised them) by the undiscreet zeale of such, as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with forrein proofs. And in the same ranke, I thinke, we ought to place that notable History, to reported by Eusebius from no meane Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an infeription, Simone Deo Sansto, that is, To Simon the holy god. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publique, should have beene quite omitted by Tacztus, by Suctionius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not have fuffered the matter to escape in filence, had it beene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then lived and flourished, would have abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so samous. Wherefore I am perswaded, that this inscription, Simoni Deo Santto, was, by some bad Critiscime, taken amisse in place of Semoni Sango: a title source hundred yeeres older than the time of Si- 40 mon Magus. For the goods of one Virravius a Rebell, had many ages before beene confectated Semoni Sangu, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sangus, in whose Chappell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought upon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should be misse-read, Simons Santto, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sangus, thereupon should frame the conjecture, which now patieth for a true History . Such conjectures, being entertained without examination, finde credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Historicall, than was conceived by the Authour. But it cannot be fafe, to let our faith (which ought to fland firme upon a fure foundation) leane over-hardly on a well painted, yet 50 rotten post-Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a few of the richest, which ever the Citie beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasurie, was made the last payment of those monies which the common-wealth had borrowed from private men, in the second Punick War. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being palt, there was remaining neither care, nor memoric, of any danger. This Triumph of Manliur was deferred by him, even fo long as he well could: for that he thought it not fafe, to make his entrance into the Citie, untill CHAP.5. S.9. of the Historie of the World. the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called one after other, into judgement, by two Tribunes of the people; men, onely by this accusation, knowne to Posterity. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that fuch unworthy men should question him, of purloyning from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargaine for his Countrey. When therefore his day of answer came; he appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the middest of the Assembly, and offered himfelse to speake. Having audience, he told the people, That upon they same day of the To yeer he had fought a great battaile with Hannibal, and finished the Punick War by a fignall victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit feafon to brabble at the Law; but intended to visite the Capitoll, & there give thankes to Jupiter, and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well & happily discharged the most weighty businesse of the Common-weale. And hereto he invited with him all the Citizens : requesting them, That if ever since the seventeenth yeer of his life, untill he now grewold, the honourable places by them conferred upon him , had prevented the capacity of his age & yet his deserts had exceeded the greatnesse of those honourable places: then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their City might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: fo as all the people, even the Officers of the 20 court, followed Scipio, leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their owne flaves and a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to judgement, untill for very fhame, as not knowing what elfe to doe, they granted him, unrequefted, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their fuit. but enforce him to fubmit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: he willingly relinquished the City, and his unthankefull Romans, that could fuffer him to undergoe fo much indignity. The rest of his time he spent at Liternum: quietly with a few of his inward friends, and without any defire of feeing Rome againe. How many yeers he lived, or whether he lived one whole yeere, in this voluntary banishment; it is uncertaine. The report of his dving in the fame yeere, with Hannibal and Philopæmen, as also of his private behaviour 30 at Liternum, render it probable, that he out-lived the Tribuneship of his accusers; who meant to have drawn him back to his answer, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howfoever it was; the same Tribunes went more sharply to work with L. Scipio the Assatique. They propounded a Decree unto the people, touching mony received of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasury; that the Senate should give charge unto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and judicially determine thereof. In favour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, & instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue; temperate, valiant, and of fingular industrie; frugall also, both of the publique, and of his owne; so as in this kinde he was even faultie : for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he uno mercifull and unconfcionable, in feeking to increase his owne wealth, by such means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice, which being poisoned with envie, troubled both himselfe and the whole City, whilest he lived. His meane birth caused him to hate the Nobility, especially those that were in chiefe estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at fuch as were of his own ranke, men raifed by defert, if their advancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whose Lieutenant he had beene at Thermopyla, was his Competitor for the Cenforship, and likely to carry it, he tooke an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious perjurie. That he had not brought into the common Treasury some vessels of gold and filver, gotten in the 50 Campe of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare unto the Scipio's, grew partly (befides his generall fpight at the Nobility) from his owne first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some checke, that was given unto himselfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did utter his diflike of the Confuls bad husbandry (judging Magnificence to be no better) in fome peremptory maner; Scipio plainly told him, That he had no need of fuch double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lyes he published, or for want of judgement, thinking unworthily of the vertue that noble deedes confuted fufficiently the author of fuch false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded northought upon by the Scipio's, whileft it was nourished by their enemy, brake out upon advantage, especially against L. Scipio: his brother being dead, or out of the way. A fevere inquiry and judgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was soone condemned in a sum of money. far exceeding his ability to pay. For non payment, his body should have beene laid up in prison: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suite against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the use of the Citie, when there neither appeared any signe of his having beene beholding to Antiochis, nor was found fo much as what he had beene con- 10 demned to pay; then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had been against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kinred, friends. and Clients, made fuch a Collection for him, as would have fet him in better estate than before, if he had accepted it. He tooke no more than fuch of his owne goods, as were of necessary use, being redeemed for him by his neerest friends.

And thus began the civill warre of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not beene, or not beene much regardable, untill now, fince the Punicke Warre. Security of danger from abroad; and some want of sufficient employment, were especiall helpes to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold upon that great Worthy, to whose vertue Rame was indebted, for changing into so great security her extreme dan-20 ger. But these factious contentions did no long while containe themselves within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in fuch quarrelfome businesse, grew to perfection, they that found themselves over-matched by their adversaries at this kinde of weapon, began to make opposition, first, with clubs & stones, afterward with swords; and finally proceeded from frayes & murders in the streets unto battaile in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare vertue that in honour of her two fons was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchi. faw those her two sons, whilest they were but yong, slaughtered in Rome, together with fome of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not revenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senatours began to 30 take upon them authority, more than was to them belonging. They conferred upon the Confuls all the whole power of the City, under this forme, Let the Confuls provide , that the Commonweale receive no detriment. By this decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemy to the State, they thought to have wonne a great advantage over the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saurninus a popular man, whom by fuch authority they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius, a famous Captaine of theirs, was fo condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senators: whereupon began the civill warres; which giving unto Sylla, who prevailed therein, means to make himselfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cafar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtaine the like soveraign power, when by the 40 like Decree of the Senate he was provoked. It is true, that never any Confull had finally cause to rejoyce, of his having put in execution such authority to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in passing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citie stand in need of a Soveraigne Lord: so the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselves, when they were over-topped by voyces in the House, did compell Casar, or give him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: wherewith prevailing against his adversaries, he tooke fuch order, that neither Senate nor people, should thenceforth be able to doe him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans confuming all or most of their principall Citizens, lost their owne freedome, and became subjects unto the arbitrary government of 50 one : fuffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their insolent rule, wherein they tooke upon them as the highest Lords on earth, to doe even what they lifled. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto unto complear greatneffe, not beleeved of her felfe as if she had, whilest a King sate crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and upholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this confummation of her honour was thought upon betimes. How it was effected, the fequel will discover.

CHAP. VI.

The fecond Macedonian Warre.

S. I.
The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans , when the warre with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrell with Philip. They deale infolently with the Acheans. The Macedonian, being unreadie for warre, obtaines peace at Rome, by his fon Demetrius; of whom thencefoorth he becomes jealous.

FTER the overthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweale of the Achaans. and all other the States of Greece, were governed by the same Laws and Magistrates, as they formerly had been, before the arrivall of the Romans inthose parts: yet in very truth (the publique declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vassals to the People of Rome. For of those five Prerogatives belonging to a Monarch, or unto Soveraign power, in whomfoever it rest; namely, To make Laws, To crease Magifrates, To arbitrate Peace and Warre, To beate Monie, & to reserve (as the French callie) le dernier Resort, or the last Appeales, the Romans had affumed foure; and the greatest of them fo absolutely, that is, The Appeale, or last resort, as every petty injurie offered to each other by the forenamed Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadours, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senators themselves within Rome; from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Common-weales, declined, He or they were beaten, and inforced to obedience, or had their Estates and Regalities utterly dissolved. Neverthelesse it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Officers of their owne ordaining: yet fo, as neither the Lawes were of force, when the Romans interpoled their will to the contrary, neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especiall regard unto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of servitude the severall Estates of Greece did bowvery gently : ejther as being thankefull for their deliverance from a yoke more sensibly grievous; or , as being skilfull in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, fince therein confifted their chiefe hope of thriving; or, as being more fearefull of displeasing the strongest, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes living further off, & being most obsequious ao unto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings : his conformity unto them in matter of war & peace, together with the diversion of their thoughts another way, giving him leave to use his owne even as he lifted, untill they should otherwife dispose of him. Neither was it a little availeable to him , that his Kingdome bordered upon the Nations, by them not throughly subdued. For upon the same reason (as well as upon his owne high deferts) were they very loving unto Mafaniffa, and to his House untill Caribage was ruined, and their Dominion settled in Africke : as likewife afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in fubie-Ction unto themselves, by the Ministery of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were usefull and obsequious unto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; & shewed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his Kingdome. But fuch magnanimity was none otherwise confirmed by the Romans, than as want of due revorence to their estate, and a valuation of himselfe against them : which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not indure. Wherefore notwith landing that he had lately given passage to their Armies through his Country, prepared the wayes for them. and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needfull to transport them over the Hallefrom into Afia, against Ansiochan; yet upon the complaint of Eumenes, and the States of The die and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Enus and

Maronea, with all Pieces and Places demanded by any of his neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, even from the Romans themselves.

These townes of Anus and Maronea had beene part of Lysimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the Northwest, extended his dominion very far. He is thought to have made himself Lord of Transylvania: in which Province it is said. * That innumerable Medals of gold have beene found, in the age of our Grand-Fathers. each of them weighing two or three Crownes, and stamped with his Image on the one fide, on the other fide with Victorie. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he lived not to settle his estate in Europe) fell to Seleucus Nicator by right of war, 19 wherein he vanquished and slew Lysimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptolomy Ceraunus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gaules, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not fustaine, did shortly and easily wash away from that crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heapes of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the fonce of Demetrius, and his fucceffors: though not much; for they were otherwise bufied. The furie of the Gaules being over-past, those Countries which lately had beene oppressed by them, recovered their liberty; and not onely held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wilde Thracians, to finde their advantages, and make use of them, even upon Macedon. Against the mischiefs commonly done by these, King Philip did provide the most convenient remedies: by shutting up the wayes, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdome; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarkes of his owne Countrey. against the Barbarians. Now, although it behooved him thus to doe, for the defence of his owneestate : yet forasmuch as these Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of justice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Ætolians, of wrongfull usurpation and oppression, in his having occupied Lysimachia. Hereto hee made a good answer. That his Garrison did only fave it from the Thracians: who, as soone as he thence withdrew his men, did feize upon the Towne, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might have faid, 30 touching Enus and Maronea That they were places unable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might have entrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not availed him, in the disputation about Lysimachia: & in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title; fince Antiochus had gotten all the Country thereabout, whilest Philip was busied in his former warre: and since they, by their vi-Ctory, had gotten unto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he only submitted his right unto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it unto their disposition, Whether Enus & Maronea should be set at liberty : whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed upon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Chersonness, that were already his by their gift. What they would 40 determine, he might eafily perceive, by the demeanor of their Embassadors towards him: who fitting as Judges betweene him and all that made complaint upon him, gave fentence against him in every controversie. Neverthelesse, he sent Embassadours to Rome, there to maintaine his right unto these Townes; wherein he thought, that equity (if it might prevaile) was wholly on his fide. For he had holpen their Confuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Ætolians: wherein whatsoever he had gotten for himselfe, was now taken from him by their Embaffadours and would they now deprive him of those two Towns, lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more? By such allegations either he was likely to pre-50 vaile, or at leastwife to gaine time, wherein he might bethinke himselfe what he had to doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equal to him, than had beene their Embaffadors. Wherefore, confidering how infolently the Maronites had behaved themselves, in pleading against him for their liberty, he tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature he was very cruell) gave order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronnes in such fort, as they might have little joy of the liberty by them to earneftly defired. Onomastus employed Callander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thra-cians by night, that they might fack the Towne, and use all cruelties of War. This years done: but fo ill taken by the Roman Embaffadors, who had better notice, than could have beene feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more firicity, than became his Majefty, to an accompt. He would have removed the blame from himselfe, and layed it even upon the Maronites: affirming, that they, in heat of their Factions, being fome inclinable to him, other fome to Eumenes, had fallen into fuch ourrage, that they had cut one anothers throates. And hereof he willed the Embaffadors to enquire among the Maranites themselves: as well knowing that they who furvived, were either his owne friends; or fo terrefied and ama-10 zed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not utter an offensive word. But he found the Romans more severe, and more throughly informed in the businesse, than to rest contented with such an answer. He was plainely told. That if he would discharge himselfe of the crime objected; he must send O somastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senare should thinke fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his fpirits, and faid, that Collander should be at their difposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not been at Maronea, nor neare to it, he requested them not to presse him; fince it stood not with his honour so lightly to give away his friends. As for Callander, because he should tell no tales; Hee tooke order to have him poyfoned by the way. By this we fee, that the doctrine, which Machia-20 vel taught unto Casar Bargia, to imploy men in mischievous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they have performed the mischiefe, was not of his owne invention. All ages have given us examples of this goodly policie, the latter having beene apt schollers in this lesson to the more ancient: as the reigne of Henry the eighth, here in England, can beare good witnesse; and therein especially the Lord Cremwell, who perished by the same unjust Law that himselse had devised, for the taking away of another

Such actions of Philip made an unpleasant noise at Rome, and were like to have brought upon him the Warre which he feared, before he was ready to entertaine it. Wherefore he employed his younger son Demetrius as Embassador unto the Senate: giving him in-30 structions, how to make answerto all complaints, and withall to deliver his own grievances in such wise, that if ought were amisse, yet might it appeare that he had been strongly urged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacific the Romans, and make all even for the present. Demetrius himselfe was known to be very acceptable unto the Senate; as having been well approved by them, when he was Hostage in Rome: and therefore seemed the more likely to prevaile somewhat; were it onely in regard that

Whilest this businesse with the Macedonian hung in suspence, and whilest he, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likely to divert from himselfe some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadors, that had beene Judges betweene him and his 40 neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controversies which they found betweene some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacadamonians against the Acheans. It was objected unto the Acheans, That they had committed a gricvous flaughter upon many Citizens of Lacedamon: That unto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing downe the walles of the City: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas, then Pretor of the Achains, made answer, That these banished Lacedamonians, who now tooke upon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them; were notoriously known to be the men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamelesly they 50 laid the blame upon others: the Achaans having onely called those unto judgement, that were supposed to bee chiefe Authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Remans : and these Plaintifes having slaine them, upon private, though just harred, as they were comming to make answer for themselves. Concerning their throwing downe the Walls of Lacedemon, he faid it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his Ordinance: who, having perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and liberty by their proper vertue, did inhibite unto them all kindes of fortifications: as the Rerraits and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedamon had wosuld experience) of Tytants and Elsurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these walls and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lycurgus his ordinances; and governed the City by their owne lawleffe Will. As for the Acheans; they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, or else would soone change them and take better, unto the Lacedemonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycortas plainely told App. Claudius, the chiefe of the Embaffadors, That hee and his Countrimen held it ftrange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to fee themselves thus constrained, to answer and give account of their actions, as vaffals and flaves unto the people of Rome. For if they were indeed at liberty: why might not the Achaans as well require to be fatisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did busie themselves, to take ac- 16 count how things went at Lacedamon? for if the Romans would stand upon their greatnesse; and intimate as they began, that the liberty of their friends was nothing worth. longer than should please themselves to ratifie it: then must the Acheans have recourse unto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, and which without perjury could not be violated; as reverencing, and indeed fearing the Remans, but much more, the immortall gods. To this bold answer of Lycortas, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking state upon him; he pronounced more like a Master than a Judge, That if the A. cheans would not be ruled by faire meanes, and earne thankes whilest they might; they should be compelled with a mischiefe, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Achaens, which 20 ground to heare the Lordly words of Appius. Yet feare prevailed above indignation: and it was permitted unto the Romans to doe as they lifted. Hereupon the Embaffadors restored some banished and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, verv foone after, did make voyd all judgements of death or banishment, that had beene laydby the Acheans, upon any Citizen of Lacedamon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citie and Territory of Lacedamon should be suffered to continue a member of the Achaan Common-wealth; or, taken from them, and made as it had been an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared. That they held it to depend upon their owne will, how much or how little any of their Confederates should be suffered enjoy: though by con- 20 tributing Spartato the Councell of Achaia, they discovered no lesse, as to them seemed, the love which they bare unto the Achaians, than the power which they had over them.

Into such flavery had the Greeks, and all Kings and Common-weales whatsoever, bordering upon any part of the Mediterran Seas, reduced themselves; by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsell and perswasions of many wise and temperate men among them; they had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Ganies, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans; and, by seeking Patronage, made meere Vassas, of Estate and Policy so prevaile with them, but their private passions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath evermore bought revenge at the price of self-ruine, brought them from the honour which they enjoyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearefull servility.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greekes very sarre from daring to stirre against those, by whom both he and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (sew of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subjection, had made his implacable enemies) in hearty affection all the Countrey would be his, whensoever he should take Armes, as shortly he was like to doe. Young Demetrius, comming home from Rome, brought with him the defired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indignity soone following. Hee had beene lovingly used at Rome, and heard with great favour in the Senate. There, being consounded with the multitude of objections, whereto his youth, unskilfull in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answer: it was permitted unto him, to reade such briefe notes as hee had received from his Father, and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his owne sake, as they then said, and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodnesse in the desence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his saults at the intreaty of his sonne, together with some insolence of his sonne, growing (as appeared) from this favour of the Romans; did increase in Philip his harred anto Rome, and breed in him a jestoufie of his too forward fonne. To fet him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadors from Rome, some bringing one commandement, some another; and some requiring him to fulfill those things. which had been imposed upon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that observed his countenance: and when he had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge, that he had done things unwillingly, and would be obedient no longer than he needs must. With these Embassadors yong Demetrius was converfant : rather perhaps out of simplicity, and for that they made much of himsthan for any ambitious respect; yet a great deale more than was pleasing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perfeus, the elder fon of the King, should not fice ceed unto his father; but that the Diademe should be conferred upon Demetrine, if not by fome other pretence, yet by meere favour of the Remans. This offended not onely Perleus, but Philip himselfe: who suspected his younger son, as more Roman than his owner and accordingly mif-construed all his doings. But ere we proceed unto the bitter fruits of this jealousie; it will not be amisse to speak of some memorable accidents that were in the meane time.

6. I I.

20 The death of Philopoemen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Militarie profession is of all other the most unhappy: notwithstanding some examples, which may seeme to prove the contrary.

HE Romans wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late beene so peremptory with the Acheans, that they seemed norunlikely to take part against them, in any controversie that should be moved. Hereuvon the Messen ans, who against their will were annexed unto the Ashean Commonwealth, having long beene of a contrary Faction therero; grew bold to withdraw themfelves from that Society, with purpose to set up againe an Estate of their owne, seveto red from communion with any other. This was the device of some that were powerfull intheir City; who finding the multitude onely inclinable to their purpole, and not overstrongly affected in the businesse; were carefull to seeke occasion of reducing things to such passe, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a necessity of standing out, and of not returning to the Achean League. And hereupon they began to doe some acts of hostility; whereby it was probable that bloud should bee drawne. and either fide fo farre exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Upon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopamen, then Prator of the Achaens, levied such forces as he could inhaste, and went against them. Many principall Gentlemen of the Achaans, especially of the Megalopalitans, were soon in a rea-40 diness to wait upon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part. Horse, he had fome Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that usually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captaine of the Messenians, whom he charged, and forced to runne. But whileft his horsemen were too earnest in following the chale; there arrived by chance a supply of five hundred from Messene, which gave new courage unto those that fled. So the Enemies beganne to make head againe : and with the helpe of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopamens Horsemen to turne backe. Philopæmen himselse had long beene sicke of an Ague, and was then very weake: yet the greatnesse of his courage would not suffer him to be negligent of their fafery, which had so willingly adventured themselves under his conduct. He tooke up 50 on him to make the Retrait : and fuffering his Horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messenians, whom the reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrefie from approaching over-neare to him. But it fell out unhappily, that being caft to ground by a fall off his Horfe, and being withall in very weake plight of body, he was unable to get up againe. So the Enemies came upon him, and tooke him; yet scarce beleeved their fortune to be so good, although their eyes were wimesses. The first messenger that brought these newes to Messene, was so farre from being beleeved, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the Citie ranne forth to meete Ttttt 2 him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible. They caused him to be brought into the Theater, that there they might fatisfie themselves with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his mis-fortune : and in commemoration both of his vertue, and of the fingular benefits by him done unto them, especially in delivering them from Nabis the Tyrant; beganto manifest their good will for his deliverie. Contrariwise, Dinocrates and his faction were defirous hastily to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and one that would never leave any difgrace, or injury, done to him, unrevenged. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong Vault under ground, that had been made for the custody of their Treasure. So thither they let him downe fast bound, and with an en- 10 gine laid an heavie stone upon the mouth of the Vault. There he had not stayed long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe unto him, with a cup of poyson, which Philopamen took in his hand : and afking no more than whether the Horfmen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycor. two was safe; when he heard an answer to his minde, he said it was well: and so with a chearfull countenance, dranke his last draught. He was seventy yeares old, and weakned with long ficknesse, whereby the poyson wrought the sooner, and easily tooke away his life. The Acheans, when they miffed him in their flight, were marvellously offended with themselves, for that they had been more mindefull to preserve their owne lives, than to looke unto the fafety of so excellent a Commander. Whilest they were 20 devising what to doe in such a case: they got advertisement of his being taken. All A. chain was by this report vehemently afflicted: fo as Embaffadors were forthwith dispatched unto Messene, craving his enlargement : and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, in case that faire meanes would not serve. Lycortas was chosen Generall of the Army against Messene: who comming thither, and laying siege to the Towne, enforced it in short space to yeeld. Then Dinocrates knowing what he was to expect, laid hands upon himselfe, and made an end of his owne life. The rest of those that had been partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds upon the affect of Philopamen that were carried home in folemne pompe to Megalopolis: where they were all of them flaine at his funerall, as facrifices to his Chost whom they had offended. 20 2. Martius, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; vvhence, upon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldome absent. He vyould have entermedled in this businesse of Messens, had not Lycortas made short worke, and left him nothing todoe.

About the same time was T. Quintim Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusias King of Bithynia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the War against Eumenes, as to entreat him that he would deliver Hannibal, the most spightfull enemy in all the world unto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prufias (therein unworthy of the Crowne he wore) did readily condescend : or rather (as Livie thinkes) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliver him alive to Flaminius. For 40 upon the first conference betweene the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiers were directed to guard and environ the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine having found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had devised some secret sallies under-ground to fave himselse from any treasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedy: which he then was constrained to practise, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing over him, as to fave himselfe from their torture and mercilesse hands; who, as he well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he faw no yvay to escape, nor counsell to refort unto, he tooke the poyson into his hand, which he alwayes preferved for a fure Antidote against the sharpest diseases of ad- co verse fortune; which being ready to swallow downe, he uttered these words: I will now (faidhe) deliver the Romans of that feare which hath fo many years possess them, that feare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victory of Flaminius, over me, which am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall never be numbred among the rest of his heroicall deeds: No it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the world, how farretheancient Roman vertue is degenerate and corrupted. For such was the noblenesse of their forefathers; as when Pyrrhus invaded them in Italy, and was ready to give them battell at their owne dores, they gave him knowledge of the treason intended against him by poyfon : whereas these of a later race, have employed Flaminius, a man who hath heretofore beene one of their Confuls to practife with Prufias, contrary to the bonour of a King, contrary to his Faith given and contrary to the Laws of Hofpitality to flaughter or deliver up his own Quelt. He then curling the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortall gods to revenge his infidelity, dranke off the poylon, and dved.

In this year alfo(as good Authors have reported) to accompanie Philopamen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: these being all of them, as great Captains as ever the World had s but not more famous than unfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whose Tragedy we have now finished, had he beene Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authoto rity might have commanded fuch supplies, as the War which he undertooke, required; it is probable, that he had torn up the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was fo ffrongly crost by a cowardly and envious Faction at home; as his proper vertue, wanting publike force to fultaine it, did laftly diffolve it felfe in his owne, and in the Common milery of his Countrey and Common-weale.

CHAP. 6. S.2.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the envie of our equals, and jealousie of our Masters, be they Kings or Common-weales, that there is no profession more unprosperous than that of men of Warre, and great Captaines, being no Kings. For belides the envie and jealoufie of men, the fpoyles, rapes, famine, flaughter of the innocent, vaftation, and burnings, with a world of miseries laid on the labouring man, are so hatefull to God, as with 20 good reason did Monluc the Marshall of France confesse. That, were not the mercies of God infinite and without restriction it were in vaine for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them : seeing the cruelties by them permitted and committed were also infinite. Howfoever, this is true. That the victories which are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders are commonly either ascribed to those that serve under them to Fortune. or the cowardife of the Nation against whom they serve. For the most of others, whose vertues have raised them above the levell of their inferiours, and have surmounted their envie: yet have they beene rewarded in the end, either with differee, banishment, or death. Among the Romans, we finde many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Zivius, L. Emilius, and this our Scipie, whom we have lately buried. Among the Greekes 30 we reade of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yea, long before these times, it was a Legacie that David bequeathed unto his victorious Captaine Joah. With this fare Alexander feasted Parmenie, Philosas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour invited Atius: who, after many other victories, overthrew Attlia of the Hunnes, in the greatest battell for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that ever was strucken in the World; for there fell of those that fought, beside run-awayes, an hundred and fourescore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told unto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Etius, he had cut off his owne right hand with his left: for it was not long after, that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slew Atius) murdered the Emperor, which hee never durst attempt, Etims living. And, besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true. That with Atims, the glory of the Welterne Empire was rather diffolved, than obscured. The same unworthy destiny or a farre worse, had Bellisarius, whose undertakings and victories were fo difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Justinian : and hee died a blinde beggar. Narses also, to the great prejudice of Christian Religion, was disgrac'd by Justine. That rule of Cate against Scipio, hath been well observed in every age since then; to wit, That the Common-weale cannot be accounted free, which flanderh in awe of any one many. And hence have the Turkes drawing another Principle, and indeed, a Turkish order That every warlike Prince frould tattler deftroy his greatest men of Warre, than 50 suffer his owne glory to be obscured by them. Forthis cause did Bajazes the second dispatch Bassa Acomas; Selim, strangle Bassa Mustaphas and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Villers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonfalve, who drave the French out of Naples and Ferdinando Correle, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with pertles not with Lawrell. The Earles of Egmond and Born had no heads left them to weare garlands on. And that the great Captaines of all Nations have beene paid with this copper Coine; there are examples mote than too many. On the contrary, it may be faid. That many have acquired the State of Punces, Kings, and Emperours, by their great ability in matter of Warre. This I confesse. Yet must it be had withall Ttttt 3 in consideration, that these high places have been given or offered unto very sew, as rewards of their military vertue; though many have usurped them, by the helpe and favour of those Armies which they commanded Neither is it unregardable, That the Tvrants which have oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lievtenants of Kingsor Emperours, which have traiteroufly cast downe their Masters, and stepped up into their feats; were not all of them good men of Warre: but have used the advantage of some commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, have obtained those dignities, which undefervedly were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those that have purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnesse of their warlike vertues is farre more in feeming than in deed. Phocas was a Souldier, and by helpe of the ro Souldiers he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a coward; and with a barbarous cruelty, seldome found in any other than Cowards, he slew first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that never had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. This his bloudy aspiring was but as a debi, which was paid unto himagaine by Heraclius: who tooke from him the imperial Crowne, unjuftly gotten; and fer it on his owne head. Leonius laid hold upon the Emperour Justine, out off his nose and earcs, and sent him into banishment : but Gods vengeance rewarded him with the lame punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge he had left his owne men of Warre, Justine, having recovered forces, lighted on Tiberiue, and barbed him after the fame fashion. Philippieus commanding the forces of Justine, murdered both the 20 Emperour and his sonne. Anastasius, the vassall of this new Tyrant, surprised his Mafer Philippism, and thrust out both his eyes, But with Anastasius, Theodosius dealt more gently: for having wrested the Scepter out of his hands, he enforced him to become a Prieft. It were an endlesse and a needlesse worke totell, how Leo rewarded this Theodolling; how many others, have beene repayed with their owne cruelty, by men alike ambitious and cruell; or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Captaines to make themselves Kings, have by Gods justice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinary, and perhaps the best way of thriving by the practice of Armes, is to take what may be gotten by the spoyle of Enemies, and the liberality of those Princes and Cities, in whose service one hath well deserved. But scarce one of athousand 30 have prospered by this course. For that observation, made by Salomon, of unthankfulneffe in this kinds, bath been found belonging to all Counstics and Ages: A little Citie, and few mouin it, and a great King came against it, and campassed it about, and builded Fores, against it Andthere was found a poore and wifeman therein, and he delivered the Citreby by wifedome, , but noneremembred this poore man. Great Monarchs are unwilling to pay great thankes, left thereby they should acknowledge themselves to have beene indebted for great benefits; which the unwifer fort of them think to favour of some impotency in themselves. But in this respect they are often times cousened and abused; which proves that weakeneffe to be in them indeed, whereof they so gladly shun the opinion. Contrariwile, free Estates are bountifull in giving thankes; yet so, as those thanks are 40 not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Captaines have made, by enriching themselves with the spoyle of the Enemy, they are very inquisitive to fearch into it, and to strip the well-deservers out of their gettings : yea most injuriously to rob them of their owne, upon a falle supposition: that even they whose hands are most cleane from such offences, have purloyned somewhat from the common Treafurie. Hereof Incednor to produce examples that of the two Scipio being to lately thing late soveraignes time, whough for the Warres, which for her owne fafetypille was confirmed to undertake, her Majeffy had no leffecause to use the service of Mathial was confirmed to undertake, her Majelly had notetlecaute to the tervice of Mathial men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predecessor many years had: yet here? 50 ding to the definy of that projection. I do not remember that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, her eldelt, and most projectous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honolited for any terrice by them performed. And that her Majelty had many advised valiant and faithfull men, the projective of her assured well witnesse; who in all her does hever received dilbonom, by the cowardize or insidelity of any Commander, by her selfectionen and imployed.

To as all her old Captaines by Land dick pooremen, as Malbey, Randol, Drewie, Rende Wilford, Landon, Pellam Gilpert Constable, Bourchier, Burkley, Birgham, and others:

to those of a later and more dangerous imployment, whereof Norrice and Vere were the most famous, and who have done as great honour to our Nation (for the means they had) as ever any did: those (I fay) with many other brave Colonels, have left behind them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many travels and wounds) nor title nor estate to their posteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Berry, L. willoughby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the worldtheir Titles and Estates.

That her Majestic in the advancement of her Men of warre did sooner believe other men than her felfe, a disease unto which many wise Princes, besides her felse, have been fubject; I fay that fuch a confidence, although it may feem altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in some fort accuse her of weakenesse. And exceeding ftrange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where the prosperous actions are so exceedingly prized, the Actors are so unprosperous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that those which are neerest the person of Princes (which Martiall men feldome are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnific a profession far more noble than their own, seeing therein they should onely mind their Masters of the wrong they didunto others in giving leffe honor and reward to men of far greater deferving and of far greater use than themselves.

But his Majestie hath already paid the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relieving by Penfions all the poorer fort, hee hath honoured more Martiall menthan all the

He hath given a Coronetto the Lord Thomas Howard for his chargeable and remarkable fervice, as well in the yeere 1588 as at Caliz, the Ilands, and in our owne Sea : having first commanded as a Captain, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiefe. His Majestie hath changed the Baronies of Montjoy and Burley into Earldomes; and created Sidney Vicount, Knolles, Ruffel, Carew, Danvers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chichester, Barons, for their governments and services in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

6. III.

Philip, making provision for war against the Romans, deals hardly with many of his own subjeds . His negotiation with the Baftarna. His cruelty. He suspecteth his son Demetrius. Demerrius accused by his brother Perseus; and shortly after slain by his fathers appointment. Philip repentesh him of his fons death, whom he finderh to have bin innocent: and intending to revenge it on Perseus, he dieth.

Mintius Martius the Roman Embaffador, who travelled up and downe, feeking what worke might be found about Greece, had received instruction from the Senate, to use the most of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedon; At his returne home, that he might not seeme to have discovered nothing, he fold the Fathers, That Philip had done what soever they enjoyeed him; yet so, asit might appear, that fuch his obedience would last no longer, than meere necessity should enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and fayings of that King did wholly tend unto rebellion, about which he was deviling. Now it was so indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithfull obsequiousnesset to the Romans, and foresaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands; with fafety of their honour, if they could finde convenient means; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparent) by what meanes foever. He was in an ill cale: as having beene already vanquished by them; having loft exceedingly both in strength and reputation; having subjects that abhorredto heare of Warre with Rome; and having neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto, urged, would adventure to take his part: yet he provided as well as he could devise, against the necessity which he daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritime Townes, and gave him cause to suspect that they would doe but bad service against the Romans, he compelled to forsake their dwellings, and removed them alkinto Emaibia. The Cities and Country, whence these were transplanted, hee filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith he thought a great deale more affured against those enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, he devised upon alluring the Baltarne, a strong and hardie Nation, that dwelt beyond the river of Dan nabens, to abandon their feat, and come to him with all their multitude: who befides other great rewards, would helpe them to root out the Dardanians, and take possession of their Country. These were like to doe him notable service against the Romans; being not onely flout fighting men, but fuch, as being planted in those quarters by him, would beare refrect unto him alone. The least benefit that could be hoped by their arrivall. must be the utter extirpation of the Dardanians; a People alwayes troublesome to the Kingdome of Macedon, when soever they found advantage. Neither was it judged any hard matter, to perswade those Bastarna, by hope of spoyle, and other incitements, to unto a more desperate Expedition, through Illyria, and the Countries upon the driaticke Sea, into Italie it selfe. It was not knowne who should withstand them upon the way: rather it was thought, that the Scordifer, and peradventure some others. through whose Countries they were to passe, would accompanie them against the Remans, were it onely in hope of spoyle. Now to facilitate the remove of these Bastarne. from their own habitations, into the Land of the Dardanians, upon the border of Macedon; a long and tedious journey unto them, that carried with them their wives and children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to passe. And thus hee fought meanes to strengthen himselfe, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Ro, 20 mans, nor were knowne unto them; fince he was not like to finde affiftance from any civill Nation, about the whole compasse of the Mediterranean Seas. But these devices were long ere they tooke effect: fo as the Baftarne came not before fuch time as he was dead; his death being the overthrow of that purpose. In the meane time he neglected not the trayning of his mento war, and the exercise of them in some small Expeditions, against those wild people that bordered upon him, and stood worst affected toward him.

But these his counsels and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell upon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne house. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wils to forsake their ancient 30 dwellings, and betake themselves to such new habitations, as he in his discretion thought meeter for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first contained it selfe within words: he having done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long lived: which also he did unwillingly, being himselfe over-ruled by necessitie, that seemed apparent. This evill therefore would foone have beene determined, had not his cruell and vindicative nature made it worfe. He could not pardon words proceeding from just forrow: but imputed all to traiterous malice; and accordingly fought revenge where it was needlesse. In his rage he caused many to die: among whom were some eminent men; and few or none of them deservedly. This increased the hatred of the 40 people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more generall, when the King in a barbarous and base furie, mistrusting all alike whom hee had injured, thought himselfe unlike to be safe, untill hee should have massacred all the children of those parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his unmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragicall than perhaps he could have defired, gave men cause to thinke (as they could not in reason thinke otherwise) that, not without vengeance powred on him from Heaven, hee felt the like miserie in his owne children. It is hard to fay what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary favour which they shewed unto Demetrius, the Kings younger sonne. It may well be (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish dissenti- 50 on betweene the brethren, but onely to cherish the vertue and towardlinesse of Demetrius; like as we find it in their Histories. But their notable favour towards this young Prince, and his mutuall respect of them, bred extreme jealousie in the fathers head. If any custome of the Romans, the manner of their life, the fashion of their apparell, or the unfightly contriving and building (as then it was) of the Towne of Rome, were jested at in ordinary discourse and table-take, Demerring was sure to be presently on fire, defending and praising them, even in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conversation with their Embassadours, as often as they came, gave his father cause to thinke, that he was no fit partaker of any counsell held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his devices with his elder fon Perfeus: who fearing fo much left his brother should step betweene him and the succession, converted wholly unto his destruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perseus was then thirty yeeres olds of a stirring spirit, though much defective in valour. Demetrius was younger by five veeres, more open and unwarie in his actions, yet thought old and crafty enough, to entertaine more dangerous practices, than his free speeches discovered. The jealous head of the King having entertained fuch suspitions, that were much increased by the cunning practice of his elder sonne, a slight occasion made the fire breake out, that had long layne smothered. A Muster, and ceremonious lustration of the Armie, was wont 10 to be made at certaine times with great folemnitie. The manner of it at the prefent was thus: They cleft in twaine a bitch, and threw the head and fore-part, with the entrailes. on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Armie was to passe. This done, the armes of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very first originall, were borne before the Armie. Then followed the King betweene his two fonnes: after him came his owne band, and they of his guard; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Having performed other ceremonies, the Armie was divided into two parts: which, under the Kingstwo sonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight. using poles, and the like, in stead of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this prefent skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the victory: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captaines did over-earnestly seeke each to get the upper hand, as a betokening of their good fuccesse in a greater triall. Some fmall hurt there was done, and wounds given, even with those stakes, untill Perseus his fide at length recoyled. Perseus himselfe was forry for this, as it had been some bad prefage: but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good use. They were of the craftier fort: who, perceiving which way the Kings fayour bent, and how all the courses of Demetrius led unto his owne ruine, addressed their services to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they faid, that this victory of Demetrins would affoord matter of complaint against him; as if the heate of his ambition had carried him 30 beyond the rules of that folemne passime. Each of the brethren was that day to feast his owne companions, and each of them had spies in the others lodging, to observe what was faid and done. One of Perfeus his Intelligencers behaved himfelfe fo indifcreetly, thathe was taken & well beaten by three or four of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of doores. After some store of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe visit his brother, and see what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting fuch of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet hee would leave none of his traine behinde, but forced them all to beare him company. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to prevent all danger. Yet was there fuch good espiall kept, that this their comming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perfeus: who thereupon tumultuously locked up his doores, as if he stood in feare to be affaulted in his house. Demerrius wondred to see himselfe excluded, and fared very angerly with his brother. But Perfeus bidding him be gone as an enemie, and one whose murdrous purpose was detected, sent him away with entertainment no berter than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accused the younger unto the father of them both. Much there was alledged. & in effect the fame that hath bin here recited, fave that by misconstruction all was made worfe. But the maine point of the accufation, and which did aggravate all the reft, was, That Demerriss had undertaken this murder, and would perhaps also dare to undertake a greater, upon confidence of the Romans; by whom he knew that he should be defen-50 ded and borne out. For Perfess made shew, as if the Romans did hate him; because he bore a due respect unto his father, and was forry to see him spoyled, and daily robbed of fomewhat by them. And for this cause he faid it was, that they did animate his brother against him: as also that they sought how to winne unto Demetrius the love of the Macedonians. For proofe hereof he cited a letter, sent of late from Time Quining to the king himselfe: whereof the contents were, That he had done wisely in sending Demetring to Rome; and that hee should yet further doe well to fend him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honourable traine of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced. That this counfell was given by Titui, of purpose to shake the allegiance of those, that CHAP. 6. S.3.

should wait upon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King become fervants to this yong Traytor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made anfwer by rehearing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as he remembred them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perfew, that converred matters of Pastime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation. whereby he fought his innocent brothers death. As for the love which the Romans did beare him, he faid that it grew, if not by his owne vertue, at leastwife from their opinion thereof: fo as by any impious practice, he were more like to lofe it wholly, than to increase it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not such passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; besides those that are common to all Plaintiffes and De-10 fendants, before ordinary Judges. The King pronounced like a father, though a jealous father. That he would conclude nothing upon the excesse or error, what soever it were of one day and night, nor upon one houres audience of the matter, but upon better objervation of their lives, manners, and whole carriage of themselves both in word and deed. And herein he may feeme to have dealt both juftly and compaffionately. But from this time forward he gave himself over wholly to Perseus : using so little conference with his vonger fon that when he had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, he liked neither to have him present, nor neere unto him. Above all, he had especialicare, to learne out what had passed between Demerring and T. Quinting, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadors to Rome, Philocles and Apolles; men whom he thought no way interessed in the quarrels between the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they faw the more in grace. The fe brought home with them a letter, faid to be written by Tum (whose feale they had counterfeited) unto the King. The contents whereof were, Adeprecation for the young Prince; with an intimation as by way of granting it, That his youthful and ambitious defires, had caused him to enter into practices unjustifiable, against his elder brother; which yet should never take effect: for that Tim himselfe would not be author or abettor of any impious device. This maner of excuse did forcibly perswade the King to thinke his fon a dangerous Traytor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gave Demetrius in cultodie, made shew as if he had pittied the estate of the un- 30 happy Prince; and so wrung out of him his secret intentions, which he shortly discovered unto Philip It was the purpose of Demetrine to Aye secretly to Rome; where he might hope not only to live in fafety, from his father and brother, but ingreater likelihood, than he could finde at home, of bettering such claime as he had in reversion unto the Crowne of Macedon. Whatfoever his hopes and meanings were, all came to nought through the falshood of Didas; who, playing on both hands, offered unto the Prince his helpe for making the escape, and in the meane while revealed the whole mater to the King. So Philip resolved to put his son to death, without surther expence of time. It was thought behovefull to make him away privily, for feare left the Romans should take the matter to heart. and hold it as a proofe fufficient, at least, of the Kings despight against them, if not of his 40 meaning to renew the war. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the unhappy Prince out of his life. This accurled Minister of his Kings unadviled sentence, first gave povfon to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was defired. Hereupon he sent a couple of Ruffians, to finish the tragedie: who villainously accomplithed their work, by Imothering that Prince, in whole life confifted the greatest hope of Macedon.

In all the race of Anigonus there had not beene found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his owne bloud. The houses of Lysmachen and Cassander fell either with themselves, or even upon their heeles; by intestine discord and jealousies, grounded on defire of loveraigne rule, or feare of lofing it. By the like unnaturall ha- 50 tred had almost bin cut off the lines of Prolomie and of Selenew: which though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grievously distempered. Contrariwife it was worthy of extraordinary note how that upftart family of the Kings of Pergamus had raifed it lelfe to marvellous greatnesse, in very short space, from the condition of meere flavery: whereof a principall cause was, the brotherly love maintained by them, with fingular commendation of their piety. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples; but is said to have propounded the last of them to his owne children, as a patterne for them to imitate. Certainely he had reason so to doe : not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Anigonas his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minority. But he was himselse of an unmercifull nature; and therefore unmeet to be a good perswader unto kindly affection. The murders by him done upon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the fatiating of his bloud-thirsty appetite, he delightfully had committed upon many innocents, both frangers, and subjects of his owne; did now procure vengeance downe from Heaven that rewarded him with a draught of his owne Poyson. After the death of his sonnes he too late began to examine the crimes that had been objected; and to weigh them in a more equall ballance. Then found he nothing that could give him fatisfaction, or by 10 good probabilitie induce him to thinke, that malice had not bin contriver of the whole processe. His onely remaining fon Perfess could so ill dissemble the pleasure which hee tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition, as there might eafily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remove of those dangers which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no leffe to bee feared than at other times, when he, as having accomplished the most of his defires, left off his usuall trouble of minde, and carefulnesse of making provision against them. He was more diligently courted, than in former times, by those that well understood the difference betweene a rifing and a fetting Sunne. As for old Philip, he was left in a manner desolate, some expecting his death, and some scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the King a deepe melancholy; and filled his head with fufpitious imaginations; the like whereof he had never beene flow to apprehend. He was much vexed: and so much the more, for that he knew neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complaine. One honourable man, a Coufin of his, named Antigonus. continued fortue to Philip, that he grew thereby hatefull to Perfew: and thus becomming subject unto the same jealous impressions which troubled the King, became also partaker of his fecrets. This Counfellor, when he found that the anger conceived against Perfew would not vent it selfe, and give ease to the King, untill the truth were known whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason objected; as also that Philos 30 cles and Apelles, (the Embassadours which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flaminius, that served as the greatest evidence against Demetrim) were suspected of forgery in the businesse: made diligent inquirie after the truth. In thus doing, he found one xychus, a man most likely to have understood what false dealing was used by those Embasfadors. Him heapprehended, brought to the Court, and prefented unto the King: faying. That this fellow knew all, and must therefore be made to utter what he knew. Xyehne for feare of torture, uttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himself. that he had beene employed by the Embassadors in that wicked piece of businesse. No marvell, if the Fathers passions were extreme, when he understood that by the unnatural practice of one fonne, he had fo wretchedly cast away another, farre more vertuous and To innocent. He raged exceedingly against himselfe, and withall against the Authors of the mischiefe. Upon the first newes of this discoverie, Apelles fled away, and got into Italies Philocles was taken: and either for a fmuch as he could not denie it when Xychus confronted him, yeelded himselfe guilty; or else was put to torture. Persens was now growne stronger, than that he should need to flye the Countrie: yet not so stout as to adventure himselfe into his fathers presence. He kept on the borders of the Kingdome towards Thrace, whilest his father wintred at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his ungracious sonne, tooke a resolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him, and confer it upon Anigonus. But his weake body, and excessive griefe of minde, fo disabled him in the travell thereto belonging, that ere he could bring his purpose to 50 effect, he was constrained to yeeld to nature. He had reigned about two and forty yeeres: alwaies full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexing him felfe with continual! warres; of which that with the Romans was most unhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wife Prince would have defired, of bringing forth together both honour and profit. But for all the evill that befell him, he might thanke his own perverse condition: since his Uncle, King Antigonus, had left unto him an estate, so great, and fo well fettled, as made it eafie for him, to accomplish any moderate defires, if he had not abhorred all good counsell. Wherefore he was justly punished by feeling the difference between the imaginary happinesse of a Tyrant, which he affected, and 614

the life of a King, whereof he little cared to performe the dutie. His death, even whileft yet it was onely drawing neere, was fore-fignified unto Perfem, by Caligenes the Physician; who also concealed it a while from those that were about the Court. So Perfem came thicher on the sudden, and tooke possession of the Kingdome: which in fine he no leffe improvidently lost, than he had wickedly gotten.

6. IV.

How the Bastarne fell upon Dardania. The behavior of Perseus in the beginning of his reign.

Some wars of the Romans: and how they suffered Masanissa cruelly to oppresse the Cartha- 10 ginians. They quarrell with Perseus. They allow not their Confederates to make war without their leave obtained. The Treason of Callicrates, whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in sormer times. Further quarrels to Perseus. He seeks friendship of the Acheums, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romans discover their intent of marring upon him.

Mmediately upon the death of Philip, came the Bastarna into Thrace: where order had beene taken, long before, both for the free paffage, and for the indemnitie of The Countrey. This compact was friendly observed, as long as no other was knowne than that Philip did live to recompence all that should be done, or sustained, for his service. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; and not heard withall, that he took any care what became of the enterprize: then was all dasht and confounded. The Thracians would no longer affoord fo good markets unto thesestrangers, as formerly they had done. On the other fide, the Bastarna would not be contented with reason, but became their owne carvers. Thus each part having lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip, grew carefull of thriving in the present; with little regard of rightor wrong. Within a while they fell to blowes; and the Bastarna had the upper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plaine Countries. But the victors made little use of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some overthrow, received by them in asfaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extreme bad weather, which is said to 30 have afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, save thirty thoufand, which pierced on into Dardania. How these thirty thousand sped in their voyage, I doe not finde. It feems that by the carelesse using of some victories, they drew losse upon themselves; and finally tooke that occasion, to follow their companions backe into their own Country.

As for Persenthe thought it not expedient, in the noveltie of his reigne, to embroile himselfe in a war so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to prove. Wherefore he wholly gave his minde to the fettling of his Estate, which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himfelfe, as the condition of his affairs should require, either for war or peace. To prevent all danger of rebellion, he quickly took away the life of Anii- 40 gonus. To win love of his people, he fate personally to heare their causes in judgement, (though herein he was so over-diligent and curious, that one might have perceived this his vertue of justice to be no better than fained) as also he gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. Above all, he had care to avoid all neceffity of war with Rome: and therefore made it his first work, to fend Embassadors thither, to renew the league; which he obtained, and was by the Senate faluted King, and friend unto the State. Neither was he negligent in seeking to plirchase good will of the Greeks, and other his neighbours: but was rather herein so excessively bountifull, that it may seeme a wonder how in few yeers, to his utter ruine, he became so griping and tenacious, His feare was indeed the mastring passion, which over-ruled him, and changed him 50 into so many shapes, as made it hard to discern which of his other qualities were naturally his own. For proofe of this, there is requifite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, butie in warres against the Spaniards and Ligarians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Ifria; subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrels, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Over the Carthaginians they bore (as ever fince the victory) a heavie hand scaliffered Masanifa to take from them what he listed. The Carthaginians, like obedient Vassals to Rome, were affraid, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leave of the Romans. Masanisa therfore had great advantage over them, and was not ignorant how to use it. He could get possession by force, of whatsoever he defired, ere their complaining Embassals could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated to leave things as they found them.

So had he once dealt before, in taking from them the Country of Emporia: and for did he use them againe and againe; with pretence of title, where he had any; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Mafanisla had wonne some land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala, and within a while, restored to the right ow-10 ners for love of his Wife Sophonisba, and of Afdrubal his Father-in-law. This did Ma-(aniffarake from them by force: and by the Romans (to whose judgement the case was referred) was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to use all manner of submissive obedience to Rome. They had scarcely digested this injury, when Masanissa came upon them againe, and tooke from them above feventy Townes and Castles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embaffadors, they made lamentable complaint unto the Roman Senate. They shewed how grievously they were oppressed by reason of two Articles in their League: That they should not make Warre out of their owne Lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were fo that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Majanista, invading their Countrey, howsoever he was pleased to call it his: yet since he was Confederate with the Romans, they durst not presume to beare desensive armes against him, but suffered themselves to be eaten up, for feare of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they intreated, that either they might have fairer justice; or be suffered to defend their owne by strong hand; or at least if right must wholly give place to favour, That the Romans yet would be pleased to determine, how farre forth Malanilla should be allowed to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then defired they, that the Romans would let them understand, wherein they had offended fince the time that Scipio gave them 30 peace; and vouchfafe to inflict on them such punishment as they themselves in honour should thinke meet: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Judges; than continually to live in feare, and none otherwise draw breath, than at the mercy of this Numidian Hangman. And herewithall the Embaffadors threw themselves prostrate on the ground, weeping, in hope to move compassion.

Here may we behold the fruits of their envie to that valiant house of the Barchines; of their irrefolution in profecuting a war so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy: and of their half-penny-worthing in matter of expence, when they had adventured their whole estate in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they servants, even to the servants of those men, whose fathers they have often chased, slain, taken & fold as bond slaves in the streets of Carthage, and in all cities of Africk and Greece. Now have they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno fo often and fo earneftly defired. Onely thy want peace with Masanissa, once their mercenary, and now their master, or rather their tormentor; out of whose cruell hands, they be seech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, and adore the Romans, whom they see flourishing in such prosperity as might have beene their owne. But the Romans had farre better entreated Varro who lost the battell at Canna; than Hannibal that wan it was used by the Carthaginians they had freely bestowed, every man of them, all his private riches upon the Commonwealth; and employed their labours for the publike, without craving recompence: as al-To they had not thought it much, though being in extreme want, to fet out an Armie into Spaine, at what time the enemy lay under their owne walles. These were no Carthaginian vertues : and therefore the Carthaginians, having fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging to the vanquished. Their pitifull behaviour bred peradventure some commiseration; yet their teares may seeme to have beene mistrusted, as proceeding no lesse from envie to the Romans, than from any feeling of their owne calamity. They thought themselves able to fight with Masanifa: which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into comparisons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no such leave as they sought, Vvvvv of defending their owne right by armes: but contrariwife, when without leave obtained they prefumed fo farre, the deftruction of Carthage was thought an eafie punishment of that offence. At the prefent, they received a gentle answer; though they had otherwife little amends. Guluffa the fonne of Mafaniffa was then in Rome; and had not as ver craved audience. He therefore was called before the Senate; where he was demanded the reason of his comming; and had related unto him the complaint made by the Cariba. ginians against his father. He answered, That his Father not being throughly aware of any Embaffadors thither fent from Carthage, had therefore not given him inftructions how to deale in that businesse. Onely it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had held Councell divers nights, in the Temple of Afailapius: whereupon he himselfe was 10 dispatched away to Rome, there to intreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans, and of his Father, might not be overmuch trufted; especially against his Father. whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the people of Rome. This answer gavelittle satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replyed, that for Masanissa his fake, they had done, and would doe, what foever was reafonable; but that it flood nor with their justice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those Lands, which by the covenants of the League, were granted unto them freely to enjoy. With this milde rebuke they difmiffed Guluffa; bestowing on him friendly presents (as alfo they did on the Carthaginians) and willed him to tell his Father, that he should doe well to fend Embaffadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian Warre was even ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing too much to offend, either the Carthaginians (for feare of urging them unfeafonably to rebellion) or Majanifa, at whose hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Majanisa by the Carthaginians, partly for feare partly for hope of better ulage in the future; by Majaniffa, in way of thankfulnesse. though if it had happened (which was unlikely) that they should be vanguished; he made none other account, than that all Africk round about him, and Carthage therewithall, should be his owne.

In the midft of all these cares, the Romans had not been unmindfull of Persew. They vifited him daily with Embaffadors; that is, with honourable spies to observe his behavi- 30 our. These he entertained kindely at first, untill (which fell out ere long) he perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any fatisfaction, untill the Bastarna were thence gone; though he protested that he had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no leffe ill contented with good offices, by him done, to fundry of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which (they said) that he did unto other some. Where he did harm to any they called it, making War upon their friends: Where he did good; they called fuch his bounty, feeking friends to take his part againft them. The Dolopians, his fubjects, (upon what occasion it is uncertaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments flew Euphranor, whom he had appointed their Governour. It feemes that Euphra- 40 nor had played the Tyrantamong them. For they were a people without strength to refift the Macedonian: and therefore unlikely to have prefumed to farre, unleste either they had been extremely provoked; or elfe were fecretly animated by the Romans. Whatfoever it was that bred this courage in them: Perfeue did foone allay it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romans took very angerly this presumption of the King:even as if he had invaded some Country of their Italian Confederates, and not corrected his owne rebels at home. Faine they would have had him to draw in the fame yoke with the Carthaginians; whereunto had he humbled once his necke, they could themselves have done the part of Masanissathough Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had beene wanting. And to this effect, they told him. That the Conditions of the League between 50 them were fuch as made it unlawfull, both to his Father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their licence first obtained.

To the fame passethey would also faine have reduced the Greeks, and generally all their adherents, even such as had entred into league with them upon equal termes: whom usually they rewarded with a frowne, whensoever they presumed to right themselves by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Acheans had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength, made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne carvers, and whose hope of extraordinary favour at Rome caused them the more willingly to refer their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to have chastised the Messenians by War; T. Quintins rebuked them, as too arrogant in taking fuch a worke in hand, without his authority : yet by his authority he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended. even with Lordly threats, when they tooke upon them to carry any bufineffe of imporrance by their owne power, without standing unto the good grace of the Romans. Who nevertheleffe upon fubmiffion, were aptenough to do them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute liberty, as by which they were not like to thrive; especially in usurping the practice of Arms, which belonged only to the To Imperiall City. In learning this hard leffon, they were fuch untoward schollers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very sharpe correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed unto their Masters. For the Roman Senate, being desirous to humble the Achaens, refused not only to give them such aide as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betweene them; but further, with a carelesse insolencie, rejected this honest and reasonable petition, That the Enemy might not be supplyed from Italy with victuals or armes. Herewith not content, the Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argives, Lacedamonians. or Corinthians would revolt from the Acheans; they themselves would thinke it a businesse no way concerning them.

This was presently after the death of Philopamen: at what time it was believed, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distresse; were it not upheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Acheans had utterly subdued the Messenians farre sooner than was expected; and when as not only no towne rebelled from the Acheans, but many entred into their corporation: then did the Romans with an ill-favoured grace, tell the fame Embaffadors, to whose petition they had made such bad answer (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citie,) That they had streightly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a fained gravity, to have served their owne turnes; they manifested their condition; both to set on the weaker against the stronger and more 30 suspected 3 and also to assume unto themselves a Soveraigne power, in directing all matters of Warre, which diffemblingly they would have feemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their Confederates: not permitting any of them to make Warre, whether offensive or defensive; though it were against meere strangers; without interposing the authority of the Senate and People of Rome : unlesse peradventure, fometimes they winked at fuch violence, as did helpe towards the accomplishment of their owne fecret malice. Now these Roman Arts, howsoever many (for gainefull or timerous respects) would seeme to understand them; yet were generally displeasing unto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent Citie in Greece, having neither subjects of their owne that might rebell, nor power wherewith to bring any into subjection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practife their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations. were much delighted in flattering the most mighty. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, untill the Warre of Mithridates : being men unfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-cravers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-weales and Kingdomes that with over-nice diligence, strove to preserve their Liberties and Lands, from consuming by peice-meale: they were to be devoured whole, and swallowed up at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most unpliant, and wherein many of the Greekes began to have af-50 fiance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were to bow, than to breake.

Neither Perfess nor the Komans were ignorant, how the Greeks at this time flood affected. Perfeus, by reason of his neere neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betweene them and his subjects, could not want good information of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopamen had long fince forerold, of the miserable subjection, whereinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman Patronage. Indeed they not onely perceived the approaching danger, but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themselves grieved with the present subjection, whereto already they were become obnoxious. Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans; yet all of them had the care, to choose among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Country, and would for no ambition, or other servile respect, be flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in feare Thus it feemed likely, that all domesticall conspiracies would soone be at an end; when honestie, and love of the Common-weale, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this carefull provision for the safety of Greece, the Romans were not throughly advertised: either because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadours, whom all men knew to be little better than Spies; or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by fuch Traitors (of whom every Citie in Greece had too many) as were men unregarded among their owne people, and therefore more like to speake maliciously than truely; or perhaps because the Embassadours themselves, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to finde our other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their owne defires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which many know, from those that are feared or flattered by many. The Acheans being to fend Embassadors to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching fome point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesse; chose one Callicrates, among others, to goe in that Embassage. By their making choice of fuch a man, one may perceive the advantage, which mischievous ad wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile defires, have against the plaine fort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselves into the troublesome bufinesse of the weale publike. For this Callicrates was in such wise transported with ambition, that he chose much rather to betray his Country, than to let any other be of more authoritie than himselfe therein. Wherefore in stead of well discharging his credence and alledging what was meeteft in justification of his people, heuttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppresse both the Acheans, and all the rest of Greece, with a far more heavie hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to look unto the fettling of their authority, among his froward Countrimen; if they meant not wholly to forgoe it. For now there was taken up a custome, to stand upon points of confederacy, and lawes : as if these were principally to be had in regard; any injunction from Rome notwithstanding.

Hencegrew it, that the Acheans, both now, and at other times, did what best pleafed themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged, or hindered, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be so, if hee, and some other of his opinion, might have their wills: who ceased not to affirme, That no Columes, or Monuments erected, nor no folemne oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the observance of Confederacie or statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrary. But it was even the fault of the Romans themselves, that themultitude refused to give eare unto such perswasions. For howsoever in popular Estates, the sound of libertie used to be more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which undertooke the maintenance of an argument, seeming never so bad, were sure by their so doing, to procure their owne good; the number of them would increase apace, & they become the prevalent faction. It was therefore frange how the Fathers could so neglect the advancement of those, that sought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman majesty. More wisely, though with seditious and rebellious purpose, did the Greeks: who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, upon men otherwise of little account or defert; only for having uttered some brave words against the Romans. The Fathers hearing these and the like reasons, wherewith he 50 exhorted them to handle roughly those that were obstinate, and by cherishing their friends, to make their partie strong; resolved to follow this good counsell, in every point; yearo depresse all those that held with the right, and to set up their owne followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not only dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Acheans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrote at the present unto all Cities of Greece, requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedamon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callicrates, they advised all men to be fuch, and so affected, as he was, in their severall common-weales. With this dispatch, Callicrates returned home a joyfull man: having brought his Country into the way of ruine, but himselfe into the way of preferment. Neverthelesse he forbore to vaunt himselfe of his eloquence used in the Senate. Onely he so reported his Embassage, that all ment became fearefull of the danger, where with he threatned those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such arts he obtained to be made Prætor of the Acheans: in which Magistracie, as in all his courses following, he omitted nothing, that might serve to manifest his ready obsequiousnesse unto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans by threatning termes wan many flatterers, and loft as many true friends: fo Perseus on the other side, thinking by liberall gifts, and hopefull promises, to 10 affure unto himselfe those that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honester than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece distracted with factions: some holding with the Romans, some with the Macedonian. and some few, respecting onely the good of the Estates wherein they lived. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitie not fufferable. That a King, no better than their vaffall, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of his trespasses: whereof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, shall affoord them just occasion to make warre upon him. Perfess having finished his businesse among the Dologians, made a journey to Apollo his Temple at Delphi. He took his Army along with him : yet went, and returned in such peaceable and friendly wife, that no place was the worse for his journy, but the good affection towards him generally increased thereby. With those that were in his way, he dealt himselfe; to such as lay further off, he sent Embassadors or letters: praying them, That the memory of all wrongs what soever, done by his father, might be buried with his father; fince his owne meaning was to hold friendship fincerely with all his neighbours. The Romans perhaps could have beene pleased better, if he had behaved himselfe after a contrary fashion, and done some acts of hostilitie in his passage. Yet as if he ought not to havetaken fuch a journy, without their licence; this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heap of his faults. He laboured greatly to recover the 30 love of the Acheans: which his father had fo lost, that by a solemn decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was jealousie perhaps, no lesse than harred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree . For how soever Philip had by many vile acts, especially by the death of the two Aratz, given them cause to abhorre him: yet in the publike administration of their estate, he had, for the more part, been to them so beneficiall, that not without much adoe, and at length, without any generall consent. they refolved to forfake him. Where fore it was needfull, even for prefervation of concord among them, to use all circumspection, that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a country towards him so doubtfully affected: especially when by hearkening to his meffages, they might make themselves suspected by 40 their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of Warre, and when all danger of innovation was past, was uncivill, if not inhumane; as nourishing deadly harred without leaving means of reconciliation. And hereof the Acheans reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like fort, forbidden the kingdome of Macedon: yet understanding what would be due to them, if they should adventure thither, none of them durst set foot therein. Hence it came to passe, that their bondmen, knowing a fafe harbour, out of which their mafters could not fetch them, ranne daily away in great numbers: exceedingly to the loffe of fuch, as made of their flaves very profitable use. But Perfew tooke hold upon this occasion: as firly serving to pacific those, whose enmity faine he would have changed into love. He therefore apprehended all so these fugitives, to send them home againe: and wrote unto the Acheans, That as for good will unto them, he had taken paines to reftore back their fervants, fo should they doe very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not run away again. His meaning was readily understood, and his letters kindly accepted by the greater partibeing openly rehearfed by the Prætor before the Councel. But Callierates took the matter very angerly; and bade them be advised what they did: for that this was none other, than a plaine device, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romans. Herewithall he tooke upon him, fomewhat liberally, to make the Acheans beforehand acquainted with the Warre, that was comming upon Perfews from Rome. Hee VVVVV3 told them how Philip had made preparations for the fame Warre; how Demetrius had beene made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perfeus had fince his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly, Herehearfed all those matters, which were afterwards alledged by the Romans; the invasion of the Bastarna, upon the Dardanians; the Kings journy against the Dolopians; his vovage to Delphi, and finally, his peaceable behaviour, which was (he faid) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he advised them to expect the event of things, and not over-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedomans. Hereto good answer was made by the Pretors brother: That Callicrates was too earnest in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings Cabbinet, nor of the Roman Se- 10 nate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to sollow. For it was well known, that Perfew had renewed his League with the Romans : that he was by them faluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that he had lovingly entertained their Embassadors: This being so: why might not the Achains, as well as the Atolians, The salians, Epirots, and all the Greeks, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanity required ? Neverthelesse Callicrates was growne a man so terrible. by his Roman acquaintance, that they durft not over-stiffely gainesay him. Therefore the matter was referred unto further deliberation and answer made the whilest, That fince the King had onely fent a letter without an Embassador, they knew nor how to resolve. Better it was to say thus, than that they were affraid to do as they thought most 26 reasonable and convenient. But when Perseus herewith not contented, would needes urge them further, and fend Embassadors: then were they faine, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and deny to give audience: which was proofe fufficient (to one that could understand) of the condition wherein they lived. For harkening to this advice of Callicrates; they were soone after highly commended by a Roman Embassador: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended War upon the Macedonian; hough hitherto no cause of War was given.

How Eumenes King of Pergamus was bufied with Pharnaces, the Rhodians, and others. His 30 hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and contemnes his enemies the Rhodians, with the causes thereof. The unusuall fournesse of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt upon Eumenes. The brotherly love between Eumenes and Attalus. Perfeus his device to poyfon fome of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree war against him, and fend him defiance. Other things concerning the justice of this War.

" Umenes King of Pergamus had beene troubled about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates, his neighbours. Hee had taken the right course; in making first his complaint to the Romans: by whom he was animated with 40 comfortable words, and promife, That they, by their authority, would end the businesse to his content. But in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings, Prusias and Ariarathes, he ended the War himselfe; and brought his Enemies to seeke and accept peace, on fuch conditions as pleased him to give them. After this, being at good leisure; he began to consider how the affaires of Macedon stood under Perseus. His hatred to Perseus, was very great: and therefore he was glad to understand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy, was as great, and withall notorious. Now, besides his ancient and hereditarie quarrell with the Macedonian; it vexed him exceedingly, That his own honours (whereof the Greekes, prodigall in that kind, had heaped immoderate store on his father and him) began to waxe every where stale: whilst Perseus, either by his cur- 50 rying favour, or by the envie borne to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despight of this indignity, He stirred up the Lycians against the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping these rebels was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open Warre. But small pleasure found he in these poore and indirect courses of revenge. The Lycians could not be faved by his Patronage, from severe and cruell chastisement, given to them by the Rhodians. This rendered him contemptible: as like wife, his acts of hostility, little different from robberies, made him hatefull to those which loved him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not onely continued falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Achaans, as too unmeasured. misbeseeming them to give, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deservings. All this (which he needed not to have regarded, had he not beene too vainely Livilly 42) ambitious) befell him; especially for his being over-serviceable to the Romans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdome; which if it fell, the liberty of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redresse hereof, he thought it vaine to strive any longer with bounty; against such an Adversary, as by hopefull promises alone, without any great performance, had over-topped him in the generall favour. And therefore he refolved even to overturn the foundations of this popularitie, by inducing the Romans utterly to take 10 away from the eyes of men this Idol, the Macedonian Kingdome, which all so vainely worshipped. Neither would it prove a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already defirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for fetting forward their wishes & perhaps to be recompenced with some piece of the kingdome, as he had bin rewarded.

To this end he made a fecond voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to fav. which they knew not before, yet his words were heard with fuch attention, as if they had contained fome strange noveltie, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. The death of Demetrin, the expedition of the Bastarna into Dardania, that of Perseus himselfe against the Dolopians, 20 and to Delphi, the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece, his intermeddling in bufinesse of his neighbours, his riches and his great provisions, were all the material points of Eumenes his discourse. Only he descended unto particulars, having searched into all (as he professed) like unto a Spie. Hee said, that Persew had thirty thousand soot, and five thousand Horse, of his owne, money in a readinesse to entertaine ten thousand Mercenaries for ten yeeres, armes to furnish a number thrice as great; The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him Souldiers as many as hee should require: and that he prepared victuals for ten yeeres, because he would not be driven, either to live upon spoyle, or to take from his owne Subjects. Herewithall he prayed them to confider, that King Seleucus, the sonne and successour of Antiochusthe Great, had given 30 his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perfew ; Perfew not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bubynia, by earnest fuite, had gotten to wife the sister of Persew, and that these marriages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassages from all quarters. Neither spared he to tell them, (though seeming loth to utter it plainely) That even the envie to their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne marvelloufly well affected to his fonne. All this, and fome facts of Persew, which might either be denied or justified, (as that he had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romans, and that he had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his kingdome, or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplifie unto the most; saying that he thought it his duty to forewarne them: fince it would be to himselfe a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italie making war upon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thirher to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly, to believe that the Romans stood in feare of Persens, less the should fet upon them in Italie. Nevertheleffe, for a fmuch as they loved not to make war without faire pretence, not onely of wrong done to them or their affociates but of further hurt intended: great thankes were given to Eumenes, who had every way furnished them with fuch goodly colour, to beautific their intendment. Now though it were fo that he told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his comming, made all feeme greater. For if upon any relation made by their 50 owne Embassadours, or upon tales devised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere he had committed any open act of hostility against them; their injustice and oppression would have been most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were fo notorious, and the danger threatning them fo terrible, that fuch a Prince as Eumenes came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Afia, to bid them looke to themselves; who could blame them, if they tooke the speediest order to obtain their owne right and securitie? Toward this justification of the warre, and magnifying the neceffitie that enforced them thereto, their more than usuall curiofitie, in concealing what Eumenes had uttered in the Senate, when they could not but understand that his errand was well knowne; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadours were at Rome, provided of answers to the words, which they knew before-hand that he would fpeake; and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of him, or of some about him, seemes to have disclosed all: when the wearinesse of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearfull apprehension; against which, it behoved their wisedome to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore carelesse audience was given to the Rhodian Embassadours; who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Anisochus had ever beene, and a provoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pompe conveighed by fea unto Perfem, his bride Laodice; which friendly office, as the Macedonian bountifully required, so the Romans de- 10 Polleg. 60. 2061 spightfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, were fettling themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes. Embassadors came from Rome with strange newes, which gave new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced. That it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to alien quite from their owne protection any people or Nation by them vanquished: and that the Lycians were by them affigned unto those of Rhodes, not as meere vaffals, but as dependants and affociates. For proofe hereof, they referred themselves unto the commentaries of the ten Embassadours; whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the victory against King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Masanisa, the Atolians, and all other Kings or Estates that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subjects, had cause to 20 finde themselves agrieved, if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like decree, those their subjects might easily be made their fellowes, when soever it should please the Senate: though it were so, that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate, which was only to plague the Rhodians for their good will to Perfem, by fetting them and the Lycians together by the eares. The Fathers could therefore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, upon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadors; which indeed more neerely touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more: for that others (as they would needs take it) conspired against him, because of his love to Rome.

But the Macedonian Embassage they heard not so carelesly as angrily: though perad-30 venture it well contented them to finde cause of anger. For whereas at other times all care had beene taken, to pacific them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Perfeus defired much to give them fatisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might favour of hostilitie; but that, if his travell in this kinde proved vaine, then would he be ready to defend himselfe by armes, and stand to the chance of warre, which often falls out contrary to expectation. These bigge words may feeme to have proceeded from the vehemencie of Harpalm, that was chiefe of the Embassadors; rather than from instruction given by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Persew himselfe might, at this time, thinke to speed better by a shew of daring, than he was like to do by any sub- 40 mission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast upon him, as on the greatest hope of deliverance from the Roman fervitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps utterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which thereon depended, by discovering his too much weaknesse of spirit, unanswerable to a worke of fuch importance. Wherefore he, or his Embassador for him, was bold to fet a good countenance on a game not very bad, but subject (in appearance) to fortune; which might have been his had he known how to use it.

Now that this bravery (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings own heat, it appeares by his daring to adventure foone after, on a practice that more justly might anger the Romans, and give them fairer shew of reason to make warre 50 upon him. It was known that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delihi in his way, and there doe facrifice to Apollo. Perfeus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his blood, refolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a facrifice, to rid his owne hands of a most mischievous enemy. So there were appointed three or foure stout rushians to doe the murder: who placing themselves behind a broken mudwall, on the side of a very narrow path leading up from the Sea to the Temple, did thence affault the King; whom they forely bruifed with great stones, and left for dead. They might have finished their work; fuch was the opportunitie of the place which they had chosen; but scare of being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all fure, slee in such haste, that they killed one of their owne companions, who could not hold pace with them, because he should not discover them. Eumenes was conveighed away to the little Ile of Agina where he was cured; being all the while kept fo fecretly, that the fame of his death was current in Afia. Hence it came, that his brother Analus took upon him as King, and either tooke or would have taken to wife (supposing it belike a matter of State) Stratonica the daughter of king Ariarathes, whom he then thought the widow of Eumenes. It may wel be numbred among the rare examples of brotherly love, That when the king returned alive home, Attalus going forth to meet him and doe his dutie, as informer times, recei-10 ved none other check than, that he should forbeare to marie with the Queene juntill he were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes never spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, unto the same brother, both his wife and kingdome. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the king his brother : though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in especiall favour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readinesse, to have transferred the kingdome from his brother to him. By fuch concord of brethren was the kingdome of Pergamas raised and upheld: as might also that of Macedon have been, if Demetrin had lived and employed his grace

It is likely that Perfeus was very glad, when he understood that his ministers had bothaccomplished his will, and had faved all from discoverie. But as he was deceived in the maine point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes lived; so was he beguiled in that other hope, of the concealement; which he vainly esteemed the lesse materiall. For he had written to one Praxo, a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertain the men whom he fent about this businesse: and she, being apprehended by C. Valerim, a Roman Embassadour. then attending upon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius, a Citizen of Brundulium: who comming newly from the Court of Macedon, loaden with a dangerous fecret, had prefently fought out the Embassador, and thereof discharged himselfe. Brundufium was the ordinary Port for ships passing between Italy and Greece. There had Ram-30 mins a faire house; wherein he gave entertainment, being a wealthy man, to Embassadors. and other honourable personages, both Romans and Macedonians, journying to and fro. By occasion of such his hospitality, he was commended to Persem, and invited into Maceden with friendly letters; as one, whose many courtesies to his Embassadors, the King was studious to requite. At his comming he was much made of; and shortly with more familiaritie than he expected or defired, made partaker of the Kings fecrets. The fumme of all was, That he must needs doe a turne, in giving to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poylon of rare quality, fure in operation, yet norto be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durft not refuse to accept this employment: for feare left the vertue of this medicine should be tryed upon himselfe. But being once at liberty, he discovered all. Rammius was but one man, and one whom the King had never seene before, nor was like to see againe : and therefore, besides that the Kings deniall ought to be as good as such a fellowes affirmation, the accusation was improbable. Thus did Perfew, in time shortly following, answer for himselfe; and in like fort concerning the attempt upon Eumenes: denying to have had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withall professing, That such objections were not to be made unto a King, to prove the rightfulnesse of making warre upon him; but rather unto a subject pleading for his life in judgement. But how loever the Romans neglected the getting of stronger proofe (which might have beene easie) than any that we finde by them produced: yet the base and cowardly temper of Perseus was very sutable to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcufable. And as for his Royall Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for fuch private offences, it gave him no priviledge: they judging him to have offended in the nature of a King. Herein furely they wanted not good reason. For if he might not lawfully make warre upon Eumenes their confederate, that is, if hee might not send men to waste the kingdome of Pergamu, or to besiege the Townes: might he send Ruffianstomurder the King! If it were no lesse breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the fword, was it lawfull for him to doe it by poyfon: Wherefore they prefently decreed warre against him; and sent Embassadours dours to denounce it unto him, unlesse he would yeeld to make such amends as they should require. He seemed at this time to have beene so consident in the generall favour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances, that if he defired not war, yet he did nor fear it: or at least he thought by shew of courage, to make his enemies more calm. He caufed the Embassadours to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them back, and bade them doe their errand. They made a tedious rehearfall of all matters, which they had long bin collecting against him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that he had entertained long and fecret conference in the Ile of Samothrace, with Embaffadours fent to him out of Afia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their maner when they intended to give defiance. Better they might have stood upon the evidence, brought against him by Rammius and Praxo. For if those accusations could be verified. then wanted they not good ground whereon to build : of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, wel-beloved, and well friended. Perseus answered for the present in a rage; calling the Romans, greedy, proud, insolent, and underminers of him by their daily Embassadors that were no better than meere spies. Finally. he promifed to give them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer stand to the league made between them and his father, and renewed by himfelfindeed only for fear: but wished them to descend to more equal conditions: whereupon he, for his part, would advise as they might also doe for theirs.

In the form of the league between Philip and the Romans, as it is fet down by Polybius, we find no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconvenience in the future; excepting those which he immediately performed. But Livie inserts a clause, whereby he was expresly forbidden to make any war abroad, without leave of the Romans. It is most likely that all the Roman confederates were included in this peace: whereby every one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring shortly into league with Rome, did so bind the Kings hands, that he could no more make war abroad, than if he had bin restrained by plain covenant. And thus might that feem an article of the peace, which never was agreed upon, but only was inferred by confequence. Now if the Romans would urge this point further, and fay, that the Macedonian might not beare defensive arms, without their per-mission: then had Perfeus very just reason to find himselfe aggrieved. For since they had allowed his father, without controle, to make war in Thrace, (whileft they themselves were unacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargaine after another fashion? Was it now become unlawfull for him to chastise his own Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By fuch allegations he maintained the right of his cause, in very milde fort : when it was too late. At the present by disclaiming the league as unjust, he ministred occasion unto the Embassadors, to give him defiance. Having heard the worst of their meffage, he commanded them to be gone out of his Kingdome in three dayes. But either he should have bin lesse vehement, or more constant in his resolution. For if his heart could serve him to undertake the war, he should couragiously have managed it, and have fallen to worke immediately, while it the Enemie was unprepared; not have lost opportunitie, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worse peace than the former.

The Romans folicit the Greeks, to joyn with them in the war against Perseus. How the Greeks Good affected in that war. The timorousnesse of Perseus. Martius a Roman Embassador deludes him with hope of peace. His forces. He takes the field and wins part of The [aly. The forces of Licinius the Roman Conful : and what a siftants the Romans had in this war. Of Tempe in Thessaly; and what advantages the Macedonian had, or might have had; but loft by his feare. Perseus braves the Romans, fights with them, knowes not how to use his vi-Borie, sues for peace, and is denied it by the vanquished. Perseus having the worse in a skirmilb, for fakes all the Countrey lying without Tempe. The Beotians rebell against the Romans and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the war against Perseus. They vexe the Greeks their friends ; for whose ease the Senate makes provision, having heard their complaints. The flattering Alabanders.

O long had the Romans beene feeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian war, that well they might have beene ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde hand in provisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the warre: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together feemed more than sufficient. This opportunitie of inaking their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were unprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or having reason to beleeve, that their owne strength was such as would prevaile in the end; they hastily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their unreadinesse a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greekes and others; who must afterwards dearely pay for any backwardnesse found in their good will. There was not indeed any cause to seare, that all of the Greekes or other Eastern people should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonian: such was the diffention betweene their feverall Estates; howsoever the generalitie of them 30 were inclined the same way. Neverthelesse Embassadours were sent to deale with them all; and to crave their helpe against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no lesse ample manner, than hereto fore they had yeelded it against Philip and Annochus, in warres pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadors used as gentle words for fashions fake. as if they had flood in doubt that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greeks were now growne well acquainted with fuch Roman courtefie: and understood that not only fuch as made refufall, but even they who might feeme to have granted half unwillingly, were like to heare other manner of words, when once this bufineffe was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their helpe to the Romans: the * Acheans and Rhodians, which were chiefe among them, being rather * Polyb. Leg. 72. o doubtfull, even when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had 73.0.80 halted in some part of their dutie. It is strange, that men could be so earnest to set up the fide, whereof they gladly would have feen the ruine. The vulgar fort was every where addicted to Perfew; of the Nobles and Rulers, if somewere vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wifest and most honest, who regarded only the benefit of their Country, wished better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number Polybius the chiefe of Historians was one: who though He * judged the victory of Perseus, like to prove hurtfull unto Greece, yet wished he * Pol.Leg. 77. the Romans ill to thrive, that so the Greekes might recover perfect liberty: for his endevours in which course, he was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed here-50 after. This confidered, it appeares, that an extraordinary feare, and not only reverence of the Imperiall City, made the Achaans, and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their feare, may be justly imputed unto the timorous demeanour of Perfeus himselse. He had undertaken a warre, whereof the benefit should redound, not only to his own Kingdome, but unto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no fooner were forme few companies brought over-fea, to make a countenance of meaning fomwhat against him, than he began to speak the enemy faire, and fue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was known, that every small thing would ferve to terrefie him; and confequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans power, by giving him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take revenge at leifure upon those which had affifted him: little cause was there why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his armie; taking by force or composition some few Townes, and soliciting all to joyne with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, he sought all meanes of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit unto the Roman Embassadours. Q. Marrius, the chiefe of those Embassadours, and a man of more finenesse in cunning than was usuall among the Romans, made shew of inclination to the Kings desire; and gave out such comfortable words, that the King entreated, and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those crimes that are before 10 mentioned. Whereto though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which they could have made for him, yet the Embassadours, and especially Marium, tooke it in good part, as therewith fatisfied: and advised him to give the like fatisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently be done, a truce was agreed upon. Thus had Martin his defire; which was, to make the King lofe time. For Perfens had all things then in readinesse, and might have done much, ere the Roman Armie could have beene in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; hee fuffered a most convenient season, of winning upon the enemy, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leifure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had bin with some victory: publishing a copie of the disputation between him and the Romans, whereby he gave men to understand, how much he had the better, and what great hopethere was of peace. He fent Embaffadors also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not onely to let them know how much he was Superiour in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take upon them, as Moderators, to compound the differences betweene him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodnesse of his cause, he should be denied peace. These were poore helpes. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing upon point of Honour, was no better than meere vanity: his owne fafety being the utmost of his ambition. This his fearefulnesse might feeme excufable, and the blame thereof to appertaine unto the Greekes; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessitie, that was partly 30 their owne: had it not bin his office, who tooke upon him as their Champion, to give fuch a manly beginning to the warre, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more aversefrom him; and were carefull, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many frout partizans, defired him not to crave any thing at their hands, in which they might feem to doe against the good liking of the Romans. The Bastians alfo, who hadentred of late into a ftrict focietie with the Macedonian; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a fort, they yeelded themselves as vassals. Neither was Martin contented to accept their submission under a generall forme; but caused their severall Townes to make covenant apart, each for it selfe; to 40 theend, that being thus distracted into many little Common-weales, they might not (were they never so desirous to rebell) have such force to doe hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, under the Citie of Thebes. This work, of separating the Baorians from Thebes their head, was more than Agefilam could effect, or Epaminondus would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedemonians. So far more availeable to Thebes, being destitute of help from abroad, was the vertue of Epaminondas and a few brave Citizens, than was the societie with King Persem, against a number not so great as followed the Laced amonians.

Marrium brought this to effect, whileft the King sate still, as being bound by the truce: and having done this, he returned to the Citie; where vaunting what he had wrought by 50 his craft, he was commended, and (though some reproved it as dishonest) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as he should thinke expedient. Touching the Embassadours which Perseu had sent, andience was given to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded: but neither excuse, nor intreatie, would serve their turne; the Senate being resolved before-hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the City, and had thirty daies respite allowed them to depart out of staly: whereas they, who came last on the same errand, did their message without the walls, in the Temple of Bellona (the usuall place of giving audience to open enemies, or to such Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie) and had onely the short warning of eleven dayes, to be gone out of Iraly. Neither did this poore courtesse serve alone to hide the crast of Martins, as if he had meant none other than good earnest: but it was a likely meane, both to keepe a long while from Perseas the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when hee should need it most firme.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius the Romane Confull, was at Apollonia, in a manner as foon, as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their King at Pella. Which, though it were enough to have rouzed Perfeus, and have made him lay afide all coward-10 ly hope of getting pardon, yet was hee content to deliberate a while. Whether it were not better to offer himselfe tributary to the Romans, & to redeeme their good will with fome part of his Kingdome, that fo he might enjoy the rest, than to put all at once to hazzard. But finally, the stoutest counsell prevailed; which also was the wifest, and so would have proved, had it beene floutly and wifely followed. He now beganne, as if the warre had not begunne untill now to doe what should have bin done long afore. He caused all his forces to be drawne together; and appointed their Rendevous at Citium, a Towns in Macedon. All being in readinesse, he did royall facrifice, with an hundred beafts, to I know not what Minerva, that was peculiarly honoured in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard set forward to Citium. His army 20 he found confifting of nine and thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, whereof about twelve thousand foor, and a thousand horse, were strangers, of fundry nations, most part Thracians; the rest his owne Macedonians. These he animated with lively speeches; laying before them the glory of their ancestours, the infolencie of the Romans, the goodnesse of his cause, the greatnesse of his provisions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cherefully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all cities of Macedon there came likewife meffengers, offering to helpe him with money and victualls, according to their feverall abilities. He gave them thankes: but answered. That his own provisions would abundantly suffice, willing them only to furnish him with carts, for his

Out of his owne Kingdome he issued forth into Thessal : knowing that the Romans were to passe through that Countrey, in their journey towards him. Some Townes of Thessal opened their gates unto him, without making offer to desend themselves; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wan by force. Of these last was Myla; a Towne thought impregnable, & therefore, not more stouly than proudly desended by the inhabitants, who gave contumelious language to the assalants. It was taken by reason of a sally; which the Townesmen rashly made, and being driven backe, received the Macedonians, that entered pell mell with them at the gate. All cruelty of war was practised here: to the greater terrour of the obstinate. So Velatic and Connus; townes of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the streights of Ossala leading into Tempe) yeelded at the sirft. Having well fortisted this passage, the King marched onwards to Sycurium, a towne seated on the foot of mount Ossa; where

Licinius the Confull brought with him onely two Roman Legions: being promifed other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes and Audus his brother came to him in Thessaly, with source thousand foot, and a thousand horse. This ther also came, from every part of Greece, such aide as the severall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to fend: which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad; Masanissa sent thither his some Misagenes, with a thousand foot, as ma-50 ny horse, and two and twenty Elephants. Ariaraihes the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinitie with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had fent to Rome his young fonne, there to be brought up: yet he did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselfe beganne within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise advised than he had beene in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on : as being allied to Perfeus, and yet fearing the Romanes. Antiochus and Ptolomy (though Prolony was then young, and under Tutors) had businesse of their owne; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian: yet each of them promifed helpe to the Romanes, which they cared not to perform. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian, Xxxxx yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a pretty tricke, wherewith M. Lucreius, the Roman Admirals brother, served him, for this his counterfeit good wil. This King had foure and fiftie ships, riding in the haveh of Dyrrachium, uncertaine to what purpose: all which Lucreius tooke away, after a very kind fort; making shew to beleeve, That for none other end than to serve the Romans, their good friend Gentius had sent thither this sleet. But what soever Genius thought in the beginning; he foolishly lost both his Kingdome and himselfe, in the end of this war; by offering, rather than giving, his helpe to Perseus.

With none other company than what he brought over the sea, Licinius came into Thessalie: so tyred with a painefull journey, through the mountainous Countrey of A- 10 thamania, which stood in his way from Epirm; that if Perfeus had been ready, attending his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needs have taken a great overthrow. He refreshed himselfe and his wearied army, by the river Peneus; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Perseus. Therefore he resolved, to abide where he then was, and keepe his trenches, untill his numbers were fufficiently increased: contenting himselfe in the meane while to have gotten quiet entrance into the Countrey. The land of Theffaly, in which these two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans. than any part of Greece besides: as having been freed by them from a more heavie yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midft of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was oftenufed at large, to fignifie the most pleasant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was not great: but adding to it those huge mountaines Off a and Olympus (famous in Poesse) with their Spurres or Branches. by which it was on all fides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessal, And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; unleffe they would make an hungry journey, thorow the country of the Daffarettans, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Perseus therefore had no small advantage, by being mafter of the streights leading into Tempe: though farre greater he might have had, if by to mis-spending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these mountaines, he were able to put the Romans often to the worfe; yea to winne upon them (for a while) every yeere more than other, both in frength and reputation: questionlesse he might have done farre greater things, had he feized upon the streights of Aou, which his father once kept, and defended all the Country behinde the mountaines of Pindus. Surely not without extreme difficulty, must the Romans have either travelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to bee found; or else have committed their armies, and all things thereto needfull, unto the mercie of Seas that were very dangerous; if they would have fought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: upon neither of which courses 40 they once devised, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps bee faid, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King must have left on his backe, would have made him unable to defend any places too far from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Etolians, upon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into suspicion with the Romans (as we shall finde anon) even as foone as they met with Perfeus. The Bactians, how politikely foever Marius had wrought with them, adventured themselves desperately in the Macedomian quarrell: what would they have done, if he at first had done his best ? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after a while began to waver, when they saw so things goe better with Perfeus, than they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by fuing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any brave performance in the beginning; and increased the number of his wel-willers, yea and bought downe with money (as he might have done) fome of his enemies, and among them; Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps have bin compelled to forfake their imperious patronage over Greece; and to render the liberty, by them given, entire; which otherwife was but imaginary. Such benefit of this war, fince it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason have bin expected expected at first, from greater advantages. But as a fearefull companie running from their enemies, till some river stay their slight; are there compelled by meere desperation to doe such acts, as done, while the battell lasted, would have won the victory: so fell it out with Perseus. In seeking to avoid the danger of that warre, whereof he should have sought the honour; he lest his friends that would have stood by him, and gave them cause to provide for their owne safety: yet being overtaken by necessitie, he chose rather to set his backeto the mountaines of Tempe, & defend himself with his proper forces; than to be driven into such miserie, as was inevitable, if he gave a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that hee kept his footing in Thessa sheet it is hard to shew particularly, for that the history of those things is much perished.

To lie, it is hard to shew particularly, for that the history of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe. The Conful having no defire to fight, untill fuch time as all his forces were arrived; kept within his trenches, & lay still encamped by the River of Penew, about three miles from Lariffa. That which perswaded the Consul to protract the time, did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter unto a hasty triall. Wherefore he invited the Romanes into the field; by wasting the land of the Pherwans their confederates. Finding them patient of this indignity; he grew bold to adventure even unto their trenches: out of which if they iffued, it was likely, that his advantage in horse would make the victory his owne. At his comming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terre-20 fied; as knowing themselves to be safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed soot, to entertaine skirmish. The Captaine, and some other of these were slaine: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, found it reasonable to hazzard battell. Thus day after day, a while together, Perseus continued offering battaile: which they still refused. Hereby his boldnesse much increased; and much more his reputation; to the griefe of those who being so farre come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell upon them by their enduring these bravadoes. The Towne of Sycurium, where Persens then lay, was twelve miles from the Romanes: neither was there any convenient watering in that long march, which used to take up foure hours of the morning; but he 30 was faine to bring water along with him in caris, that his men might not be both weary and thirsty when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconveniences, he found out a lodging, feven miles neerer to the enemy: whom he visited the next day by the Sunne rifing. His comming at fuch an unufuall houre, filled the Campe with tumult? in so much as though he brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were unfit to affaile the trenches, yet the Confull thought it necessary, and resolved to give checke to his pride. Wherefore hee fent forth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many brave Captaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature, to trie their fortune: he himselfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readinesse. The honour of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victory in a manner entire (though the Thessalians made a good retrait) with little losse of his owne. But he discovered his weakenesse ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe, to counsale given by one of his owne temper. For whereas the Romans were in great feare less the should assault their campe; and to that purpose, upon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought unto him by the Captaines, though unsent for: he neverthelesse tooke it for sound advice, which indeed was timorous and base, To worke warily, and moderate his victory; by which meanes it was said, that either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at leastwise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it beene greater, and had he wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would have beene the more, and the bolder. But over-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in suing for it, even when he had the victory, what else did he, than proclaime unto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keep him from yeelding to the Romans, when so yer they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the love of his victory would ad-neither good nor bad fortune should keep him from yeelding to the Romans, when soever they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the joy of his victory would admit none of these consideratious. He had slaine of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot hee had slaine about two thousand: loosing of his owne no more than twenty horse and forty foot. The Romane Campe, after this disaster, was full of heavinesse and feare: it being much doubted that the enemy would fet upon it. Eumenes gave counfaile to dislodge by night, and remove to a furer place beyond the River Penew. The Confull, though ashamed to professe by fo doing, in what feare he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the losse past. than by standing on proud termes, to draw upon himselfe a greater calamity. So hee passed the River in the dead of the night, and encamped more strongly on the further fide. The £10lians were forely blamed for this loffe: as if rather a traiterous meaning. than any true feare, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greeks followed them. Five of them that were men of especiall marke, had beene observed to be the first which turned their backes: an observation likely to cost them deare, at a time of better leifure. As for the Theffalians, their vertue was honoured with reward : fo as the Greeks 10 might learne, by examples of either kinde, that if they would shunne indignation, or incurre favour, then must they adventure no lesse for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would doe for their owne liberty. Thus fared it with the Confull and his Armie. Perseus came the next day to correct the former dayes errour; which how great it was he not untill then found. The Ramanes were gotten into a place of fafety; whither they could never have attained, if the King had either pressed his victory, or given better heed to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to have routed them whilest they were conveying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might have beene done, fince there was no remedy. The Romans were beaten, even the flower of their City, the Gentlemen of Rome; out 20 of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generalls themselves, Prætors, Confuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea, they were beaten fo shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather up the spoiles of them without refistance, as yeelding themselves overcome. With such brave words did the King set out the glory of his action; dividing the spoiles among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to have made his honor found. He came neerer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopfelus, a place in the mid-way betweene Tempe and Lariffa: as if it were his meaning to presse them somewhat harder. Neverthelesse he was easily perfuaded to use the occasion, which he seemed to have, of obtaining peace. Therefore he fent unto the Confull, and offered to yeeld unto the fame 30 Conditions, wherein his Father had beene bound to the Romans; if the warre might fo take end. It were needleffe here agains to shew the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this defired peace there was in the Conful no greater power than to grant a truce, whileft Embaffadours might goe to Rome: it refting in the Senate and People to approve the conditions and ratifie the league. And of such a truce granted by Marrius, he had lately found no small discommoditie redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of peace there was none; fave that Perfeus would yeeld both his Kingdome and person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to be fo resolute in adversitie. On the other fide, it argued a very faint heart in Perfew, that having received an answer so peremptory, 40 he ftill perfifted, making vaine offersof greater tribute. Finding that the peace, which he fo much defixed, could not be purchased with money, the King withdrew himselfe backe to Sycurium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the comming of Misagenes the son of Masanisa, with the aide before mentione d. This distance betweenethe King and them, caused the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their harvest: about which business they ranged over all the fields. Their careleffe demeanour gave him hope to doe fome notable exploit: which he attempted, both upon their Campe, and upon those that were abroad. The Campe he thought to have fired on the fudden: but the alarme being taken in good feafon, he failed in the enterprize. As for the forragers; he had a good hand upon them, if he could have with-50 drawne it, and given over in time. But whilest he strove to force a guard, he was visited by the Conful; by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is divers) in a great battell, he was overcome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Per-Jeus, after a few dayes, to fall backe into Macedon; as being naturally given to feare danger, even where none was; whereby what loffe he felt, will appeare hereafter. He left all behinde him, fave onely Tempe, weakely guarded and confequently an eafie prey to the Romanes.

it, and so to have gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the worke too hard, he returned backe unto the Perrabians and others; from whom he won some townes, & among the rest, Lariffa. There were fundry townes thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consult tooke, may seeme not to have belonged unto the Theffalians; unlesse, perhaps, after his victory, Perfeus did greater Acts than we finde recorded, and got some part of Thessaly.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to give a precise account; for that the histories of them are greatly defective. One may thinke it strange, that the Baotians, whom a Roman Embassadour could terrefie, and bring altogether to his owne will, To should not be afraid of a Roman Armie, then on foot in Greece, and a Navie on their coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the Art of Martius, were more true to Rome, than other petty townes, which by that same distraction of the Bæstians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had beene. The causes hereof were to have beene sought among the changes, happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now loft. Some of them rebelled, and were throughly punished by Lucretius the Roman Admirall: who got fo much by spoiling them, that he would have brought others to rebell in like fort, if by extreme oppression he could have driven them so farre. Neither was Licinius the Consull undiligent in the same kinde. What his doings were, after such 20 time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I finde no where mentioned. Onely this is said in generall; That in the warre which he made, he cruelly and coverously demeaned Lindings

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the yeere following; Hostilius the Confull, and Horsensius the Admirall, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hostilius shewed more of his industrie, in picking quarrels with the confederates of Rome, than in profecuting the war against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman warre upon his Kingdome, after that the Confull had fought paffage in vaine over certaine mountaines, Perfew feemed, in a maner, free from it. He was troubled indeed on that fide which look-Polyb. Light 702 ed towards Illyria, by Ap. Clauding, whom the Confull fent thicker with an Armie of 30 foure thousand, and who, by levies made upon the Confederates, doubled this his Armie. But Claudius thinking to have taken uscana, a border towne of Illyria, by treason, came thither in such carelesse order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treafon, with purpose onely to traine him into danger; fallied forth upon him, overthrew him, and chased him so farre, that hardly he escaped with the fourth part of his company. Yet this towne of uscana shortly after became Romane: which howsoever it happened, Perseuvery soone recovered it, and many other places therewithall: Corys a Thracsan King, securing him on the one fide of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirot, revolted from the Romans, on the other. Perseu likewise made a painefull journey into Eto. lia: where he was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Romane faction, yet in his returne home, he tooke in Aperancia; and shortly heard good newes, that Ap. Claudius was againe throughly beaten by Clevas, one of his Lievtenants. Such fuccesse had the Macedonian war under Hostilius. The same Consull offended much the Greeks, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadours made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadours travellinig thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gave out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who sought not by might and maine to advance their businesse, than of those which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to have accused by name, in the Parliament of Polyb. Leg. 74. Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopæ-50 men; & together with him, his fon Polybius, who foon after was Generall of the Achean horse, but more notable by that excellent historie which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honourably discharged. The summe of the accusation should have beene; That these were not heartie friends unto the Romans, but such as abstained from raising troubles, more for lacke of opportunitie than for any love to the common quiet. But fince no colour of truth could be found, that might give countenance to such a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, & give gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Liolians: They demanded hostages; and found some in the Councell that approved the motion: as also among the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to have Roman garrisons bestowed in their townes. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions tooke effect. They of the Roman faction, accused not only such as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but also the good Patriots; making it no leffe than a matter of treason, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary fide, there wanted not some, who roundly told these pick-thankes of their base flattery; rating them openly, in such fort, that one of them hardly escaped being froned, even in presence of the Embassadours. Thus was all full of accusations, and excuses: among which the Embassadours carried themselves, as men that could believe none ill; though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published, to this effect: That it 10 should be free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burthen for the present warre, unlesse it were such, as the Senare had likewise thought meete. Of this decree the whole Country was glad : for it was, or feemed, a good remedy of many inconveniences. But they that standing on priviledge hereof, refused to fulfill every commandement, were numbred among the Patriots; which in the end of this warre, proved little better, if not worse, than to have beene Traitors. The Senate was driven to set downe this order; by reason of the many & vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, and especially by the Admirals, Lucretius and Hortenfius. Lucretius was condemned in a great fum of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they lo-20 ved not to have their subjects oppressed. Hortensius being still in office, had warning to

Among the great number of Embassages that came to Rome about this time, either to seek redresses of injuries, or to offer their services: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a towne of the lesser Asia, there was presented unto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base piece of statterie. These Alabanders brought three hundred horsemens targets, and a crowne of gold, to bestow upon Jupicer in the Capitol. But having a desire to gratiste the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutiful obedience, wherein they would be singular; and being not able to reach unto any great performance: they built a Temple, unto the Towne Rome, & appointed anniversary games to be celebrated 30 among them, in honour of that goddesse. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Anigonus, Ptolomy, & the like vaine men, that would be thought gods; or at the shamelesse shattery of such as bestowed upon men, and not the most vertue us of men, divine honours; when he sees a towne of houses, wherein powerfull men dwell, worshipped as a goddesse; and receiving (without scorne of the givers, or shame of the Present) the title of Deitie, at the gift of such a rascall Citie as Alabanda?

Q.Martius the Roman Conful, with extreme difficulty and danger, enters into Tempe. The 40 cowardize of Perseus in abandoning Tempe. The towne of Dium quitted by Martius; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill successe. Their affaires in hard estate. Martius a cunning and a bad man. Polybius sent Embassadour to Martius from the Achaens. Polybius his honest wisedome beneficiall to the Achaens. King Eumenes growes averse from the Romans. Perseus negotiates with Antiochus, and Eumenes. His salse dealing with Gentius king of Ilyria; whom he draws into the Romane warre. He sends Embass adours to the Rhodians; who vainely take upon them to be arbitrators betweene him and the Romanis. Perseus loseth a mightie succour of the Bassana, by his wretched parsimonic.

Fter two yeeres of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began; which had beene thought likely to reforme all those Countries, and bring them to what passe the Romans desired; as it did in the end. Persons had hitherto the better, and was stronger now, than when he lived in peace. He had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian side; his friends, in all parts of Greece, tooke courage daily; and his reputation grew such, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the warre might prove, and thereupon to become wise for themselves. Contrariwise, Licinius, & Hossilius the Consuls, had one after the other spent their time in vaine, seeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conquest, by many losses received. The Roman Admiralls had so demeaned themselves, that many Townes, even of the best affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Roman fide; and the Armie much leffened, not onely by casualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or elfe of the Conful himfelfe (for they laid the blame one upon the other) in licenfing the fouldiers to depart. Quimius Martius the new Conful, who fucceeded unto Hostilus, was to amend all this: which neverthelesse was more than he knew how to doe 5 though he brought with him a strong supply of men. He began hotly to set the 10 warre on foot, which a long time had flept. And he began the right way : not feeking to force the streights that were furely guarded, but taking pains to climbethe mountains which were thought able to forbid all paffage over them, without helpe or need of any custodie. The King heard of his approach; and being uncertaine what way he meant to take, distributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might give entrance, or permit afcent. But the Conful proceeded in his journey: with hope, either not to be discovered by the Enemie, or to breake through all opposition, or at leastwise, to fight on as convenient ground, as they should have that lay to stop him, and at length. if all failed, to make a late retreat. He sent before him foure thousand of his most extedit foot to difcover the waies. Two daies was this company troubled, in overcomming 20 the difficultie of no more than fifteene miles : after which they had fight of the Enemie, that lay to denie their paffage. They occupied therefore a fafe peece of ground; and fent backe word to the Confull, where they were, intreating him to haften unto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit diffnayed at his arrivall; but met him, and fought with him, two or three dayes together; each returning to their owne Campe at night, with little loffe on either fide. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gave scarcely roome unto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the rest were beholders. In this case, it was impossible to get forwards: yet a shame to returne. Wherefore Marrine tooke the onely course remaining and indeed the best: Part of his men hee left with 30 Popilius, to attend upon the Macedonians: whilest hee, with the rest, fercht a compaffe about, and fought out waves that never had beene troden. Herein he found extreme difficultie: which notwithstanding hee overcame. Besides the troubles conmonly incident to fuch journeyes, through places unfit for habitation: he was compelled, by labour of hand, to make pathes where none were, yea, where Nature might feeme to have intended, that none should bee. So steepe hee found the descent of the mountaines, in this way which he tooke: that of feven miles, which they travelled the first day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themselves downe, as not daring to trust their feet. Neither was this the worst. For they met with rockes, that flood one over another, so upright, and cumbersome to get downe; that their 40 Elephants were affraid of the giddy prospect, and casting their governours, made a terrible noise, which affrighted the horses, and bred great confusion. Having therefore gone, or wallowed, four miles of this grievous journey othere was nothing more defired by the fouldiers, than that they might be fuffered to creepe backe againe, the fame way which they had come. But shift was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kinde of bridges, like into falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was joyned to the edge of the eliffe; the other fuftained by two long postes, fastened in the ground below. Upon these two postes, or poles, (which indeed, not being very strong, since it was intended that they should bee either cut or broken) were fastned two rafters, anfwerable in length to the distance, betweene the higher and the lower fall: so as the 50 end of one bridge might reach to the beginning of another. These were covered with plankes and turle; that they might feeme continent with the ground; fo to make the beaftes adventurous to goe upon them. If there were a plaine of any good extent from the foot of a rocke, to the next downefall; then might the bridge be shorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, upon one of thefe; the polts upholding the frame were cut afunder; thereby caufing him to finke downe unto the next bridge; whence hee was conveyed in like manner, to the third, and onward full to the verie bottome. Thus went they downe fliding, some on their feet, others on their buttocks, till they came to an even valley. By this it appeares how throughly provided the Romans used to be in their journeyes, of things needfull in all occasions: as also what inestimable paines they tooke in this descent, about the conveyance of themselves and all their carriages downe the mountaines. The next day they rested; staying for Popilius and his company, who hardly or perhaps never, should have overtaken them, if the Enemie had followed, and set upon him from alost. The third and fourth dayes journeyes were like unto the first save that custome, and the neernesse to their wayes end without meeting enemy, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perfeus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: fince they fought with his men upon the paffage, three daies together; he lying fo nigh, that he might welneere have heard the noise. Yet was he so possessed with feare; that he neither stirred is to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Confull, nor made any provision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counfaile, fate hearkening after the event. Foure onely passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus; which the Romans were unable to force: the second and third were the same which Martius had attempted in vaine, and another like unto it: the last, by the City of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded and whosoever would seeke any other way. must be faine to take such paines as Martius had undergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, fave through the valley it felfe, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium flood upon the foot of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile 20 from the fea: of which mile, the River Helicon becomming there a lake, and called Baphyras, took up the one halfe; the rest being such as might easily have been fortified. Befides all these, there was in the middest of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keepe: where the spurres of the mountaines, reaching farre into the valley, drew necre to the very bankes of Peneus, a goodly and deepe river which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had beene more easie, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublefome journey: if Perseus could have seene his owne advantages. For the Roman Armie was not onely in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable travaile: but must need have either perished for want of victually, or bin inforced to returne the same way that it came, if the King had made good the streight of Dium. To have returned, 30 and climbed up with their Elephants and carriages, against those rocks, from which, with extreme labour, they could hardly get downe, it feemes a matter of impossibilitie: effectially confidering how the enemy from above their heads, would have beaten upon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken though he knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange that the Romans did not rather take their journey into Macedon, from the fide of Illyria, whence that Kingdome had often beene invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe, whence, after that they were arrived, there was no meanes to escape, without forcing one of those passages, which they despaired to winne. But the cowardife of Perfeus did commend the counfell by them followed, as wife. For 40 hee no fooner heard that the Enemie was come over the mountaines into Tempe; than hee fared like one out of his witts; faying, That hee was vanquished, and had lost all without battaile. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what hee could carry away in haftes and straightwayes abandoned the Towne. In the same vehemencie of amazement, he sent a strait commandement to Thessalonica, that the Arsenall there should be fet on fire; and to Pella, that his treasures there should be cast into the sea: as if the Romans were like prefently to be mafters of these two Cities. Niceas, who was appointed to drowne the treasure, performed it hastily as well as he could: though soone after, his mafter grew force for the loffe; and it was all, in a manner recovered by Divers from under the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to fet fire on the Kings 50 Arfenall, deferred the execution; forefeeing that repentance might follow: and so he prevented the dammage. Whether Niceas, for his absolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicus for his carefull providence, merited the greater commendation, or more easie pardon; it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of their service, was this. Perfer growing ashamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this hastie direction; caused them both to be slaine. Also those poore men, which had fetcht his treasure out of the Sea by their diving, were payed their wages after the same fort: that so there might be no witnesse of the Kings base folly. Such end must they seare, who are privie to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Persens would have gone surely to worke, for the hiding of his fault; then must be so royally have behaved himselfe, that no man might believe him to be the author of any unworthy act or counsaile. But his vertue was of no such capacity. He thought it enough to lay the blame upon others. And therefore, having called Hippias away (the Captaine which had stopped the Consult on the top of the mountaine) & Ascelepiadatus, from defence of the passages, whereto they were by him appointed: he rated them openly; saying, that they had betrayed unto the Enemy the gates and bars of Macedon. Of this reproach, is they would discharge themselves, by laying it upon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they have sped to as did Nicias and Andronicus.

of the Historie of the World.

The Confull Marins had great cause to rejoyce, for that the King so hastily relinquis shed his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the Roman Army, this norwithstanding, was hardly able to subsist, for want of victuals. He took Diant without relistance; and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein having travelled about a dayes journey, and gotten one towne that yeelded, he was compelled by meere lacke of food for his men, to returne backe towards Theffaly. His fleet came to him, in this time of necessity, well appointed to have holpen him in the warre: but having left behinde, at Magnesia, the ships of burthen, which carried the provisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lievtenants had beene carefull to occupy the Ca-20 files about Tempe, which were for faken by the Macedonians: for by those wayes onely might corne be brought into the Army. To meet the sooner with this corne, which was most desirously expected, he for sooke Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish journey (if not worse than foolish) he lost more, than a little the longer fasting had beene worth. It is probable that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountaines : for otherwise it had beene madnesseto put himselfe on such an enterprise, fo flenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or fight of the Enemie, he should be faine to quit it. How soever it was: men thought him a coward, or at least a badde man of warre; fince he thus recoyled and gave off, when it most behooved him to have profecuted the action.

By understanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himselfe. understood his owneerror; fought to hide it by such poore meanes as have beene shewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the towne of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dis-mantled by the Romans. This done, he encamped strongly by the River of Enipem: meaning there to stop the Enemiesproceeding all that Summer. Leffe diligence, more timely used, would have beene enough, not onely to have delivered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace: but to have given him fuch a noble victory, as might caufe the Romans to feeke a good end of the warre upon faire conditions, and not to begin againe in hafte. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Confullan exceeding hinderance. For lirtle or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Onely the towne of Heraclea, standing on the River of Penew, five miles from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a tricke of climing upon mens heads. fomewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made fuch defence as it could, and was not given up for feare. After this, Martius did fet a bold face towards Dium; as if he would have taken it againe, and have driven the King further off: though his intent or hope was nothing like fo great: his chiefe care, being to provide for his wintering. He fent the Admirall to make attempt upon the Sea-Towns, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias, and others. All these were assayed: but in vaine. The fields about Thesialonica were wasted; and some companies, that fundry times adventured forth of the Towne. 50 were still put to the worse. As for the Town it selfe; there was danger in comming neere it, either by land or fea; by reason of the engins, which shot from the walls, and reached unto the fleet. Wherefore the Admirall fetting faile from thence, ran along by Enia, and Antigonea, (landing neere to each of them, and both doing and receiving hurt) until he came to Pallene in the territory of Caffandrea. There King Eumenes joyned with him, bringing twenty shippes of Warre: and five other were sentthither from King Prusias. With this accesse of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the towne : which while the Romans were filling up, question was made, what became of the earth taken thence, for that it lay not upon the banke. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were arches in the town-wall filled up with that earth, & covered with one fingle row of bricke. Hence the Admirall gathered hope of making way into the town, by fapping the walls. To this worke he appointed fuch as he thought meetest: giving an alarme to the other fide of the town, thereby to shadow his attempt. The breach was soone made. But whilst the Romans were shouting for joy, & ordering themselves for the assault: the Captaines within the towne perceived what was done; and fallying forthunexpected, gave a fierce charge on the companies that were between the ditch & the wall; of whom they flew about fixe hundred, and fuffered few to escape unwounded. This disaster, and the want of good successe on that part of the town which King Eumenes assailed (a supply in To the meane while entring the towne by fea) caused the fiege to breake up. Torone was the next place which the Admirall thought meet to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Enphranor, a Macedonian Captaine, was gotten before his comming, with fuch forces, as were not onely sufficient to have defended the Town, if the Admirall had layed siegeto it, but to keepe the land about it from spoile; or at least (as they did) to make the enemy pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his journey to Demetrias, by Melibaa; whither the Conful (that he might not be quite without worke) had fent his Lievtenant to befiege it : and by the terrour of his appearing suddenly over their heads, caused the besiegers to dislodge in all haste, setting their Campe on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, fo far was their ability short of their Enterprises; ever fince their Confull (whether dastardly, or carelesly) most unlike a good Commander, had let goe his hold of Macedon, by forfaking Dium: Yea, it is to be fuspected, that some greater harme befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, than is expressed in the broken remaining Historie of this Warre. For Martius perswaded the Rhodians by Agesipolis their Embassador, who came to him at Heraclea about other businesse of lesse importance, That they should doe well to interpose Pobb. Legat. 82, themselves as mediatours, and seeke to finish the Warre. Now, although Polybius doc most probably conjecture, that this was rather a malicious device of Marious, crastily feeking to bring the Rhodians indanger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolu- 20 tion of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perfens, or of Antiochus, who had then an armie on foot : yet fince he made shew of feare, it is like withall, that somewhat had happened, which might make his feare seeme not counterfeir. And so were the Rhodians moved to thinke of him; not onely for that the extraordinary courtefie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embassadour, comming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadours of Perseus, and of Gentius the Illyrian, did fet out their businesse at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good sleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of fome victory, wherein he had lately flaine great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we finde intimated : though 40 the time, place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome to view the estate of Marius his army. For they found the Conful wanting meat; the Admirall wanting men; and, for those few that he had, wanting both money and cloathes: and Ap. Claudius the Prætor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, so unable to invade Masedon, that contrariwise, he was in extreme danger; so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new army be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seeme, that some blow had beene taken on the Illyrian fide, which made all to halt; or at least, that the Romans with greater losse, than is before spoken of, had beene driven from some of the Townes which they befieged.

Now although it were so, that Martius invery few of his actions, behaved himselfe like a man of warre: yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aprly termed, a crooked or finister kinde of wisedome, he dealt as a crafts-master, with a restlesse working diligence. This indeed neither proved his fufficiencie, nor commended his honestie: fince thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit; and neverthelesse, out of envic, vaine glory, or such delight as weake and busie-headed mentake, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his Countrey. At such time as Perseus, by the successe of his doings against Hostilius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to invade Theffaly; Archo, Lycorias, and other good Patriots among the Acheans, judged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romans, as in a time of adversity, whom in prosperity they loved not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree, which paffed: That the Acheans should fend their whole power into Thessay, and participate with the Romans in all danger. So the Armie was levied; and Polybius, Polyb. Legat. 78. with others, sent Embassadors unito Mariaus, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleafure. Polybius found the Confull bufie in finding paffage through Tempe into Macedon. He went along with the Armie; and awaited the Confulls leifure till they came to Heraclea; where finding the time convenient, he presented the Decree, and offered the service of his Nation, wherein foever it should be commanded. Maritus tooke this very io kindely ; but faid. That he needed now no manner of helpe. Forthwith Polybiar dispatched home his companions, to fignifie thus much: tarrying himselfe behinde in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martins, that Ap. Claudius defired, or rather imperiously required, of the Acheans, five thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest , that Appears had need of these men; and that if he were strong in field, he might doe notable fervice, by distracting the forces of Perseus. But the Labyrinibian head of Marines could not allow of such plaine reason. He called unto him Polybrus, to whom he declared, that Appries had no need of fuch aide, and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wife take order that the men might not be fent, nor the Achaans be put to fuch needleffe charges. Away went Polybius; muling, and unable to refolve, whether it were for love to the Acheans, that the Conful was fo earnest in this business; or rather for envie, and to hinder Ap. Claudius from doing any thing, fince himselfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliver his opinion in the Councell touching this matter; then found he a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne felfe, and those of his partie. For as he was sure to incurre the great indignation of the Confull, if he should neglect what was given him in charge; so was it manifest on the other fide, that the words by Martius uttered to him in private, would prove no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to helpe Claudins, alledging that he had no need: In this case therefore, he had recourse unto the Decree of the Se-30 nate: which exempted men from necessity of cloing what the Roman Commanders should require, unlesse by speciall order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred unto the advice of the Confull: by whom it was fure to bee made frustrate. Hereby the Acheans were favers, of more than an hundred and twenty Talents: though Polybius himselfe ranne into danger of Appus his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countries behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long yeers im-

Whether it were by the like policie of Martius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to fland in feare 40 left the fire, which he himselfe had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his own lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to overfway all other passions: it is hard to determine: fince they that had better means to know the truth, have not precifely affirmed any certainty. One report is, that Eumenes did not fo much as give any helpe to Martius: but comming to have joyned with him, in fuch friendly manner as hee did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that he refused to leave behinde him certaine horse of the Gallo-Greeks, being requested to have done it. If this were true; and that his brother A:talus tarrying behinde with the Conful, did the Romans good service: then is the reason apparent, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, & the love to Atta-30 lus. But it is more generally received; that Eumenes gave a willing eare to Perfeus his defire of accord, for meere defire of gaine. And it might well be, that coverousnessed well be, that coverousnessed according to the coverousnessed according to him on, in the course, whereinto indignation first led him. Howsover it befell; Perseus caused Eumenes to be sounded, and found him so tractable, that hee was bold to solicite him by an Embassage. The tenour of his advertisements, both to Eumenes & Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect love betweene a King and a free Citie: that the Romans had quarrell a like to all Kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and used the helpe of one against another; that Philip was oppressed by them, with the helpe of Arralus; Antiochius, with the helpe of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus affailed, with helpe of Eumenes and Prusias. Herewith he willed Eumenes to consider. that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Alia. which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to thinke better of Prusias, than of him. In like fort he admonished Antiachen, not to looke for any good conclusion of his Warre with the Egyptian, to long as the Romans could make him give over, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either to compell the Romans to surcease from their warre upon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies unto all Kings. Antzochus lay farre out of the Romans way : and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more neerely toucht; and as he felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should 10 give answer; he began to offer a bargaine of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no lesse weary, than Perseus was affraid. Wherefore he promised, for his owne part. That if he might have fifteen hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this war. then would be remaine a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantitie of money (how much I finde not) he would also bring the Romans to condescend unto peace: and for affurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to give hoftages. Perfeus liked well to receive the hostages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine have peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promifed to be at any reasonable cost: but he would lay down the money in the Temple at Samoibrace : whence it should be delivered unto Eumenes, after 20 that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus his owne: and therefore Eumenes thought the money no neerer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserved somewhat, how soever the businesse might happen to succeed: so that needs he would have part of his wages in prest. Thus the two Kings did no more, than lose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans.

After the same manner delt Perseus with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainly, and faid, That without money he could not flirre. Hereunto Perseus loved not to hearken sthinking , that his Treasures would serve at the last cast to deliver him from all his feares. But when the Romans had gotten with- 30 in Tempe, then did his feare urge him to prodigalitie; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargaine was soone made, and pledges on both fides delivered for performance. This was openly done by Ferfeus, to the end that all his Armie might have comfort, by such accesse of strength to their partie. Presently upon the bargaine made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perfeus and Gentius: who defired the Rhodians, to take upon them, as arbitrators, between Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the Warre to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Marius the Confull was no leffe defirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, that they, by their authority, would make peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing proud words to the 40 same effect, from the Rhodian Embaffadours; gave an answer as disdainfull, angry, and menacing, as they could devise: so as this vaine glory of the Rhodians was throughly chastifed; and more throughly should have beene, if their submission had not been as humble, as their folly was proud. Such use of Gemaus his friendship, made Perseus; without laying our one ounce of filver. Now faine he would have haftened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the Warre: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantauchus the Macedonian Emdaffadour, who remained with Gentius, exhorted him daily to begin the Warre by land and fea, whileft the Romans were unprovided. But finding what it was that made all to ftay; he fent word to Perfeus. Hereupon ten Talents were sent to Pantauchus: who delivered it to the young King, as earnest of 50 that which followed. More followed indeed; and sealed up with the seale of the Illyrians; but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Gentius had layed hands upon two Roman Embassadours, and cast them into prison. Which Perfeus no fooner heard, than he recalled his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their loade to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessitie to make warre with the Romans, whether he were hired thereto or not.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aid of Perseus, under one Clondieus a petty King, tenne thouland horse and tenne thouland foot, of the Gaules, which were (as Plutareb hath it) the Bastarne. These had before-hand made their bargaine. and were to receive present pay at the first. At their entry into the Kingdome, Perseus fent one to them; defiring their Captaines to come vifit him, whom he promifed to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King had fent money to give the fouldiers their pay in hand, according to his bargaine? Hereto the meffenger had not what to answer. Why then (faid Clondicus) tell thy Mafter. That the Gaules will not stirre one foot further, untill they have gold, as was agreed, and hostages. Persem hereupon tooke counsell: if to utter his owne opinion before men so wife that they would not contradict him, were to take counfell. He made an investive 10 against the incivilitie and avarice of the Bastarna: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Fivethouland horse of them he fayd would be as many as he should need to use; and not so many, that he should need to feare them. It had been well done, if any of his Counfellors would have told him. That there wanted not employment for the whole Armie of them. fince without any danger to the Kingdome, they might be let out, by the way of Perrabia, into Theffaly: where wasting the Country, and filling themselves with spoyle, they should make the Romans glad to forfake Tempe, even for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable fervice, whether they won any victory or not. This, and a great deale more, might have beene alledged, if any man had dared to give advice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had beene with them before, was sent againe, to let them know the Kings minde. He did his errand: upon which followed a great murmure of those many thousands that had beene drawne so far to no purpose. But Clandicus asked him now againe, Whether he had brought the money along with him to pay those five thousand, whom the King would entertain. Hereto when it was perceived that Antigonia could make no better answer, than shifting excuses, the Bustarne returned prefently towards Danubins, waiting the neighbour parts of Thrace; yet fuffering this crafty messenger to escape unhurt: which was more than he could have well expected.

Thus dealt Perfem, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preferve his mony for the Romans, without diminishing the sum. But of this painfull Office he was very foon discharged by L. Emylius Paulus the new Conful: who in fifteen daies after his serting forth from Italy, brought the kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed over it a king so foolish and so cowardly.

Y the Warre of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though it were not accompanied will any consecution, that either * they decreed that Province to L. Emylius Paulus, Plus in the chance of lot. between him semile without putting it, as was otherwise their manner, to the chance of lot, betweene him similar and his fellow Confull; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it upon him, than that fo worthy a man was advanced to the dignitie of a fecond Confulship. Hee 50 refused to propound unto the Senate any thing that concerned his Province; untill by Embaffadours, thither fent to view the estate of the Warre, it was perfectly understood, in what condition both the Roman forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being throughly knowne to be such, as hath been already told, the Senate appointed a strong supply, not onely to the Consul, but unto the Navie, and likewife to the Army that lay betweene Illyria and Epyrus; from which App. Claudins was removed, and L. Anicius fent thither in his place. Emylius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custome, spake with much gravitie and authoritie. Hee requested those that thought themselves wise Yyyy enough to manage this warre, either to accompany him into Macedon, and there affift him with their advice; or else to govern their tongues at home, and not take upon them to give directions by hearesay, and censure by idle reports: for hee told them plainely, That he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Emplim, who died valiantly in the Battell of Canne, might well be living in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conforme themselves the more gladly unto the instructions given by a wise and resolute Consul.

All his businesse within the Citie being dispatched, Emylius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his journy; with an especiall hope of men, that he should finish the war: though that he should finish it so soon as happily, was more than could have bin hoped or imagined. He came to Brundusum: whence, when the wind came faire, he set saile at break of day, and arrived safely at the Isle of Corcyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where, having done facrisice to Apollo, after the sist hay he set forwards to the Camp, and was there in five dayes more. So are there but sive of the sisteen dayes remaining, in which he finished the war.

Persentay strongly encampedat Dium; having spared no labour of menand of women to fortifie the bankes of Enipem, where it was foordable in drie weather: fo as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and consequently, as little possibility to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconvenience troubling the Romans, and much difabling 20 them to make attempt upon Dium, was lacke of fresh water. For there were ten miles between Dium and Tempe; all the way lying between the Sea shore and the foot of Olymwww. without any Brook or Spring breaking forth on that fide. But Amylius found prefent remedy for this, by digging Wells on the shore; where he found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shore that wants them, though they rife not above the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Mariam from taking up his lodging any neerer to the enemie, than the Towne of Heraclea, on the river of Penews, where he had watering at pleasure, but could performe no service of any worth. Yet when the Roman Campe had fuch meanes to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did, the passage onward being defended as hath beene shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. 30 Wherefore it was necessarie to search another way: which by enquirie was soone found out. There was a narrow passage over Olympus, leading into Perrabia; hard of ascent. but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire journey. Marisus either had not been informed hereof, or durst not attempt it; or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the adventure; they fearing left it would prove such a piece of worke as had beene their march over Offa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industry, courage, and abilitie to command. He had reformed, even at his first comming, many disorders in the Roman Camp: teaching the fouldiers among other good leffons, to bee obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselves, as had been their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now hee appointed about five thousand 40 mentothis enterprise; whereof he committed the charge unto Scipio Emplianus and 2. Fabius Maximus, his owne fons by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a fon of Scipio the Africanthe other, by one of the Fabii. Scipio took with him fome light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his main strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, upon the mountain confifted in a maner, wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at fome diffance they might doe notable fervice against those that should climbe up unto them; yet when the darknesserook away their aime, they were like to make a bad nights work, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the businesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way towards the Fleet; where victuals were provided for their journy: it being noised, that they were to run along 50 the coast of Macedon by sea, and waste the country. All the while that they were passing the mountains (which was about three daies) the Conful made flew of a meaning to fet upon Perseus where he lay, rather to divert the Kings attention from that which was his main Enterprise, than upon any hope to doe good, in seeking to get over Enipeus. The channell of Engreus, which received in Winter time a great fall of waters from the mountains, was exceeding deep and broad; and the ground of it was fuch, as though at the prefent it lay wel-neer all dry, yet it ferved not for those that were weightily armed to fight upon. Wherefore Emplays employed none fave his Velites; of whom the Kings light ar-mature had advantage at farre distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towers which Perfess had ray sed on his own bank, did also beat upon the Romans, and gave them to understand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Emylius persisted as he had begun; & recontinued his assault, such as it could be the fecond day. This might have ferved to teach the Macedonians, that some greater worke was in hand: fince otherwise a good Captaine, as Amylins was known to be, would not have troubled himselfe with making such bravado's, that were somewhat costly. But Perfens looked only unto that which was before his eyes: untill his men, that came running fearfully down the Mountain, brought word into the camp, That the Romans were To following at their backes. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himfelfe no leffe (if not more) amazed than any of the rest. Order was forthwith given to dislodge; or rather without order, in all tumultuous hafte, the Campe was broken up, and a speedy retrait made to Pydna. Whether it were fosthat they which had custodie of the passage were taken fleeping or whether they were beaten by plain force, Scipio and Fabius had very good successe in their journey. It may well be, that they slept untill the Romans came formwhat neer to them; and then taking alarm, when their arrowes and flings could doe little service, were beaten at handie-strokes: so as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybim, and an Epistle of Scipio, may each of them have beene true. Thus was an open way cleered into Macedon: which had bin effected by Martins in the yeere fore-going; but was closed up again, through his not profecuting fo rich an opportunitie.

Perfeus was in an extreme doubt what course to take, after this unhappy beginning. Some gave advice to man his Townes, and so to linger out the Warre: having beene taught by the last yeeres example, how resolute the people were in making defence. But farre worse counsell prevailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and searefull deliberations. The King resolved to put all at once to hazzard of battell: fearing belike to put himselfe into any one Towne, lest that should be first of all besieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures alwayes are jealous) not over-carefully relieved. This was even the same that Amylium, or any invader; should have desired. So a place was chosen neere unto Pydna, that served well for the Phalance, and had likewise on the sides of it some peeces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light armature. There he abode the comming of the enemie; who stayed not long behinde him. As soone as the Romans had sight of the Kings Armie; which, with greater sear than discretion, had hasted any story them for solving the Campe that was so portably well sortified, they desired any from them, forfaking the Campe that was fo notably well fortified: they defired nothing more, than to give battellimmediately: doubting left otherwife the King should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul; praying him not to lose occasion by delay. But Employ told him, that he spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to have patience. The Romans were tyred with their journey; had no Campe wherein to rest themselves; nor any thing there, save only the bare ground whereon they trode. For these, and the like respects, the Consul made a stand; and shewing himselse unto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of battell, gave charge to have the Camp measured out and entrenched behind the Armie; where-into, at good leasure, he fell back, without any maner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped, both by the Romans and the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their own Generall too blanse, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the King, he excused himselfe by the backwardnesse of the enemie; who advanced no further; but kept upon ground serving ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That evening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpieim Gallm, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeere beene Prætor, foretold unto the Confull, and (with his good liking) unto the Armie, an Eclipse of the Moone, which was to be the same night: willing the fouldiers not to be troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might be knowne long before it was seene. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses, to beat Pannes of Brasse, and Basons, as wee doe in following a swarme of Bees; thinking that thereby they did the Moone great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpicius converted

trariwife, the Macedonians howled and made a great noy fe, as long as the Eclipse lasted: rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrefied therewith. as with a prodigie betokening their loffe; fince their defire to fight was no whit leffened by it. I will not here stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses doe signific, or cause any alteration in civill affaires, and matters that have small dependance on natural complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthy of observation it is, how superstition captivates the wisedome of the wisest, where the help of true religion is wanting. Emylim, though he were fufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moon, that it was no fupernaturall thing, nor above the reach of humane understanding, so as he should need to trouble himselfe with any devout regard thereof: yet could he not refrain from doing 10 his duty to this Moon, and congratulating with facrifice her deliverie, as foon as she shone out brightagain: for which he is commended even by Plutarch, a fage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not assist him in this foolish devotion. yet is it like, that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councell for war, was partaker the next morning in a facrifice done to Hercules; which was no leffe foolish. For a great part of the day was vainly confumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with any Sacrifice, and vouchfafe to shew tokens of good luck in the entrailes of the beafts. At length, in the belly of the one and twentieth facrifice, was found a promise of victory to Ampleus: but with condition, That he should not give the onset. Hercules was a Greek, and partiall, as neerer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had bin better to 20 call upon the new goddesse, lately canonized at Alabanda; or upon Romules, founder of their Citie, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deitie; or (if a God of elder date were more authenticall) upon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of militarie affairs; and who therefore would have limited his favour, with no injunctions contrarie to the rules of war.

Now concerning the Battell; Emylin was throughly perswaded, that the king meant to abide it: for that otherwise he would not have stayed at Pydna, when as, a little before. his leisure served to retire whither he listed, the Romans being surther off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Confull thought that he might wait upon advantage, without making any great hafte. Neither was it to be negle- 10 Cted that the morning Sun was full in the Romans faces: which would be much to their hinderance all the forenoon. Since therefore Perfew kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Amylim fent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder, there was no likelihood of fighting that day. But about ten of the clock in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which whereto neither of the Generals had

A Horse brake loose at watering, which two or three of the Roman fouldiers followed into the river, wading after him up to the knees. The Kings men key on the further bank; whence a couple of Thracians ran into the Water, to draw this horse over to their own side. These fell to blowes, as in a private quarrell; and one of the Thracians was slain. 40 His Countrimen feeing this, hasted to revenge their fellowes death, and followed those that had flaine him over the river. Hereupon company came in, to help on each part, untill the number grew such as made it past a fray, and caused both the Armies to be carefull of the event. In fine, each of the Generals placed his men in order of battell, accordingly as the maner of his country, and the Arms wherewith they served, did require. The ground was a flat levell, fave that on the fides a few hillocks were raifed here and there; whereof each part might take what advantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater numberithe Romans the better fouldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Conful encouraged their men with lively words: which the prefent condition could bountifully affoord. But the King, having finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew 50 himselse into Pydna: there to doe sacrifice, as he pretended, unto Hercules. It is the letle marvell, that he durst adventure battell, since he had bethought himselfe of such a stratageme, whereby to save his owne person. As for Hercules, he liked not the sacrifice of a Coward: whose unseasonable devotion could be no better than hypocrifie. For he that will pray for a good Harvest, ought also to Plow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battell, he found it no better than loft: and he, in looking to his owne safetie, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight-The

The acts of this day, such as we finde recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly presse onwards. and beat off all which came before it, as Emplies was thereat much aftonished; That the Peligni rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were over-borne, many of them slaine; and the fquadrons following them so discouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that fell out averse to the Romans; and which the Consul beholding, is faid to have rent his coat-armour for griefe. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his devoyre, the victory might have beene his owne. That which turned the fortune of the battell, was the same which doubtlesse the Confull expected, even from the beginning: the difficultie or almost the impossibilitie of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilest some of the Romans small battalions pressed hard upon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessarie (if the Macedonians would follow upon those which were put to the worse) that some files having open way before them, should advance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This comming so to passe, admonished the Consul what was to be done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of littleuse, when they were charged in flanke by the Roman Targettiers; according to the direction given by Amylius, when he faw the front of the Enemies great battell become unequall, and the ranks in some places open, by reason of the unequal resistance which they found. Thus was the use of the Phalanx proved unavaileable against many small squadrons, as it had beene formerly in the battell of Cynoscephala: yea, this forme of embattailing was found unserviceable against the other, by reason, that being not every where alike distressed, it would breake of it felfe; though here were little fuch inconvenience of ground; as had beene at * Cyno- *Chap 4. $-14.

Perseus, when hee saw his battell begin to route, turned his bridle presently, and ranne amaine towards Pella. All his horse escaped, in a manner untouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witnessing the little good service which they had done. As for the poore foote, they were left to the mercy of the Enemie: who flew above twenty thouland of them; though having little cause to 30 be furious, as having lost in that battell, onely some fourescore, or fixescore men at the most. Some of the foot, escaping from the execution, overtooke the King and his company in a wood; where they fell to rayling at the horfemen, calling them cowards, traytors, and fuch other names, till at length they fell to blowes. The King was in doubt left they had ill meaning to himselfe: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by fuch as thought it good. The rest of the company dispersed themfelves: every one as his own occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within a while to leffen. For he fell to deviling upon whom he might lay the blame of that dayes misfortune, which was most due to himself: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrinke away from him, how they could. At to his comming to Pella, he found his Pages and houshold servants, ready to attend him, as they had beene wont. But of his greatmen that had escaped from the battell, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholy time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldnesse to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their unfeasonable admonitions, he stabled them both to death. After this, none whom he fent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in feare, lest they that refused to come at his call, would shortly dare some greater mischiefe, he stole out of Pella by right. Of his friends he had with him only Evander (who had been employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewife about 500. Creisans, more for love of his mony than of him. To these he so gave of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftie Talents, though shortly he coozened them of some part thereof; making shew as if he would have redeemed it; but never paying the money. The third day after the battell he came to Amphipolis, where he exhorted the Townel-men to fidelitie, with teares : and his owne speech being hindered by teares, appointed Exander to speake what himselfe would have uttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chiefe care to looke well to themselves. Upon the first same of the overthrow; they had emptied their towns of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garrison: sending them forth under colour of a gainefull employment, and shutting the gates after them. And now to be rid of the King, they plainly bade Evander to be gone. The King hearing this, had no minde to tarry: but embarking himselfe and the treasure which he had there, in certain vessels that he found in the river Strymon; passed over to the Isle of Samothrace: wherehe hoped to live safe, by priviledge of the religious Sanctuarietherein.

I he fifth Booke of the first part

These miserable shifts of the King make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the Kingdome fellinto the power of Amylim, within so few dayes after his victorie. Pydna, which was neerest at hand, was the last that yeelded. About fixe thousand of the fouldiers. that were of fundry Nations, fled out of the battell into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and confent. Hippin, who had kept the paffage over Offa against Martin, with Pantauchus, who to had beene fent Embassadour to Genius the Illyrian, were the first that came in : yeelding themselves, and the Towne of Beraa, whither they had retyred out of the battell. With the like meffage came others from The flatonica, from Pella, and from all the Townes of Macedon, within two dayes: the loffe of the head bereaving the whole body of all fense and firength. Neither did they of Pydna stand out any longer, when they knew that the King had forfaken his Countrey: but opened their gates upon fuch termes, that the fack of it was granted to the Roman Armie. Emylius fent abroad into the Countrey, fuch as he thought meeteft, to take charge of other Cities: he himselfe marching towards Pella. He found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents; the same whereof Persem had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a very little while he shall have 20

It was soone understood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuarie in the Temple at Samothrace: his owneleters to the Confull confirming the report. He fent these letters by perfons of fuch mean condition; that his case was pittled, for that he wanted the service of better men. The scope of this writing was, to defire favour: which though he begged in termes illbefeeming a King, yet fince the inscription of his Epistle was, King Perfem to the Conful Paulus; the Conful, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and would not allow him to retaine the Title, refused to make any answer thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby he craved and obtained, that fome might be fent to conferre with him about matters of his prefent 30 estate. Neverthelesse, in this conference, hee was marvellous earnest, that hee might be allowed still to retaine the name of King. And to this end it was perhaps, that hee had so carefully preserved his Treasure, unto the very last: flattering himselfe with such vaine hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuarie, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him have his defire to live at ease, and to be called King. Yea, it feemes that he had indeed, even from the beginning, a defire to live in this If of Samothrace: both for that in one of his confultations about the Warre, he was dehorted by his friends, from feeking to exchange his Kingdome of Macedon, for * fuch a paltrie Iland; and for that he offered to lay up the money which Eumenes de- 40 manded, in the holy Templethat was there. But he findes it otherwise. They urge him to give place unto necessitic, and, without more adoe, to yeeld to the discretion and mercy of the people of Rome. This is fo farreagainst his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Presently there arrives at Samothrace Cn. Offavius the Roman Admirall, with his fleet: who affayes, as well by terrible threats, as by faire language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole; wherein, for feare of imprisonment, he had now already imprisoned himselfe. When all would not serve, a question was moved to the Samothracians: How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like holy priviledg of Sanctuary by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quick. The Samothracians, being 50 now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and fend word to the King, That Evander, who lives with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact, committed at Delphi, whereof unlesse he can cleere himselse in judgement, he must not be fuffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reverence borne to his Majestie, now past, makes them forbeare to say, that Persem himselfe is charged with the fame crime. But what will this availe, when the minister of the fact being brought into judgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the author e. Perseus therefore willeth Evander to have confideration of the little favour that can be expected at the Romans hand; who are like to be prefidents and overfeers of this judgement: fo as it were better to dye valiantly, fince none other hope remaines, than hope to make good an ill cause; where though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this motion Evander feemes to like well: and either kilshimfelfe, or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get poy fon where with to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandement. The death of this man, who had flucke to Perseus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to for fake him: foas none are left with him, fave his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leave him upon this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and fay, That the King hath lost the priviledge of this holy Sanctuary, by murdering Evander therein. Or if the Romans will affirme so much, who shall dare to gainefay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and eventhat also lyable to dispute, which preferves him from captivitie; he purposeth to make an escape, and flye, with his Treasures, unto Corys his good friend, into Thrace. Organdes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one thin; who eafily was perswaded to waft the King thence. With all secrecie the Kings mony, as much as could be fo conveyed, was carried aboord by night; and the King himfelfe, with his wife and * children (if rather it were not true, that he had with him onely * Phi- Plui, in nits Lip his elder fonne, who was onely by adoption his fonne, being his *brother by nature) stry! with muchadoe got out at a window by arope, and over a mudde wall. At his com-Livilians ming to the Sea-fide, he found no Oroandes there: the Cretian had played a Cretian tricke, and was gone with the money to his owne home. So it began to waxe cleare day, whileft Perfeus was fearching all along the shoare: who had stayed so long about this, that he might feare to be intercepted ere he could recover the Temple. He ranne therefore amaine towards his lodging: and thinking it not fafe to enter it the common way, left he should be taken, he hid himselfe in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him, ranne up and downe making inquirie; till Offavim made Proclamation. That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatfoever, abiding with their mafter in Samothrace, should have their lives and libertie, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yeeld them-30 felves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion, a Thessalonian, to whom the King had given the custodie of his children, delivered them up to Ottavins. Lastly, Perfew himselfe, with his son Philip, accusing the gods of Samoibrace, that had no berter protected him, rendered himselfe, and made the Roman victory compleat. If he had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of living, than of reigning therein; he might well have brought this war to an happier end. Now, by dividing his cogitations, and pursuing at once, those contrary hopes of saving his Kingdome by arms, and himselfe by flight, he is become a spectacle of misery, and one among the number of those Princes, that have bin wretched by their own default. He was presently sent away to English before whom 40 he fell to the ground so basely, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the victory over himselfe, as gotten upon one of abject quality, and therefore the lesse to be esteemed. E. mylius used to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for having with so hostile a minde, made War upon the Romans. Hereto good answer might have been returned by one of better spirit. As for Persean, he answered all with a fearfull filence. He was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Confull tearmed it) almost affurance; for that fuch was the mercy of the people of Rome. After these good words being invited to the Confuls Table, and respectively entreated, he was committed prisoner to

Such end had this Macedonian War, after foure yeers continuance and fuch end there-50 withall had the Kingdome of Macedon; the glory whereof, that had fometime filled all parts of the World then knowne, was now translated unto Rome.

Gentius, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

Bout the same time, and with like celeritie, Anicius the Roman Prætor, who succeeded unto App. Claudius, had the like successe against King Genting the Illy-Fran. Genting had an Armie of fifteene thousand; with which he was at Lisson. ready to affift King Perfess as soone as the money should come, whereof he had received onely ten Talents. But Anicim arrested him on the way, fought with him overcame him, and drave him into * Scodra. This Towne was very defenfible by nature, 10 besides the help of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, affifted with the Kings presence, made it seeme unpossible to be wonne, in any nota very long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late victory; and therefore presented his Armie before the walls, making countenance to give an affault. The Illyrians, that might eafily have defended themselves within the Towne, would needs iffue forth and fight. They were, it feemes, rather passionate than couragious: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazedly to treat about yeelding. The King fent Embaffadours; by whom, at first, he defired truce for three dayes, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had layd violent hands on the Roman Embaffadours, to have recourse to such meditation. But he thought his owne fault pardo-20 nable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harme done by him, than the casting of those Embassadours into prison, where they were still alive. Having obtained three dayes respite, he passed up a River, within halfe a myle of the Roman Campe, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to consult the more privately; though indeed, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Caravantius was comming to his rescue. Finding that no fuch helpe was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to returne into Scodra. He sent messengers craving accesse unto the Prætor: beforewhom having lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonestie, was not so great as his folly present) he fell downe humbly, and yeelded himselfe to discretion. All the Townes of his kingdome, together with his wife, children, brother, friends, were prefently given up. 30 So this war ended in thirty daies: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun, untill Perpenna, one of the Embassadors that had bin imprisoned, brought word from Anicaus how all had passed.

How the Romans behaved themselves in Greece and Macedon after their victory over Perseus.

Ow began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune; and to looke tyrannically upon those that had beene unmannerly toward them before, whilest the War with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were still at Rome, when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them doe their errand againe. This they performed with a bad grace; faying, that they were fent from Rhodes to make an overture of peace; forasmuch as it was thought, that this Warre was no lesse grievous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalfe of the Rhodians did congratulate with the Senate and people of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had beene expe-50 acd. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassage to Rome, not for love of Rome, but in favour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (covetous of the charge) to have Warre proclaimed against Khodes; the Embassadours were fo affrighted, that in mourning apparrell, as humble suppliants, they went about the Citie; befeeching all men, especially the great Ones, to pardon their indifcretion, and not to profecute them with vengeance, for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being knowne at Rhodes, all that had beene any whit averse from the Romans in the late Warre of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or fent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that flew themselves for feares wholegoods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and leffe would have done, if old Me. Care, a man by nature vehement, had not uttered a milde fentence, and advertifed the Senate, That in decreeing war against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that * rather the wealth of that Citie, which they talkingue. were greedy to ranfacke, than any just cause, had moved them thereto. This confidera- and satest defended tion, together with their good deferts in the wars of Philip and Antio chem, helped well conjunationile the Rhodians: among whom, none of any marke remained alive, fave those that had not beene of the Roman Faction. All which not with standing, many yeeres passed, ere by 10 importunate fuit, they could be admitted into the focietic of the Romans: a favour which till now they had not effected; but thought themselves better without it, as equall

With the like, or greater feveritie, did the Romans make themfelves terrible in all parts of Greece. Emilius himselfe made progresse throughthe Countrey; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them understand what power he had over them. More than five hundred of the chiefe Citizens in Demetrias were flaine at one time by those of the Roman saction, and with help of the Roman fouldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things. when complaint was made to the Confulathe redreffe was fuch as requited not the pains of making supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed unto the Romans the liberty of their Countrey, he feasted like a King, with excessive cheere; yet so that he had all things very cheape in his Campe: an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in fending provisions, nor fet on them the due price. Embassadours likewise were fent from Rome; some, to give order for settling the estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate, than was usuall in such cases; and some to visit the affaires of Greece. The kingdome of Macedon was set at liberty by Empless and the Embassadors, his assistants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this liberty was fuch as the Romans used to bestow. The best part of it was, Thatthe 30 Tribute which had beene payed unto the Kings, was leffened by halfe. As for the reft, the Country was divided into four parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobility were fent captive into Italy, with their wives and children, as many as were above fifteene yeeres old. The ancient Lawes of the Countrey were abrogated; and new given by Emylius. Such mischiefe the Senate thought it better to doe, at the first alteration of things in this Province, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leave any inconvenience that should be worse in the suture. But concerning the Greekes, that were not subjects to Rome, the things done to them could deserve no bettername than meere tyranny, yea, and shamelesse perjury; were it not so, that the samiliar custome, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oathes of confederation feeme of no validitie. The Embassadours that were fent to vifit the Greekes, called before them all fuch men of note, from every quarter, as had any way discovered an unserviceable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made fure enough. Some of these had fent letters to Perseus which fell at length into the Romans hands: and in that respect, though they were no subje ces, yet wanted there not colour for using them as traytors or at least as enemies. But fince onely two men were beheaded, for having been openly on the Macedonian fide; and fince it is confessed, that the good Patriots were no lesse afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had fold themfelves to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcufable Tyrannie. With the Achaens these Embassadours were to deale more formally: 30 not formuch because that Common-wealth was strong, (thoughthis were to be regarded by them, having no Commission to make or denounce Warre) and like to prove untractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of figne, by letters, or otherwife, whereby any one of the Acheans could be suspiciously charged to have held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callicrates, nor any of his adherents, had bin employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their fervice to the Romans; but onely fuch as were the best Patriots. Yet would not therefore the Embaffadours neglect to use the benefit of the time: wherein, since all men trembled for feare of Rome, the feafon ferved fitly to ranke the Achaans with the reft.

And hereto Callicrates was very urgent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were not now taken, he and his fellower should be made to pay for their mischievous devices, ere long time passed. So the Embaffadours came among the Achaans: where one of them, in open affembly of the Na. tion, spake as Callicrates had before instructed him. He said, that some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other meanes befriended Perfess. This being fo. he defired that all such men might be condemned, whom, after sentence given, he would name unto them. After fentence given (cried out the whole affembly) what justice were this? Name them first, and let them answer; which if they cannot well doe, we will foone condemne them. Then faid the Roman boldly, that all their Prætors, as many as To had led their Armies, were guilty of this crime. If this were true, faid Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence, then should I likewise have beene friend to Perseu: whereof if any man can accuse me, I shall throughly answer him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Upon these words of Xenon the Embassadour laid hold, and faid that even so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themfelves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not untill he had cited above a thousand; willing them to appeare and answer before the Senate. This might even be termed the captivitie of Greece; wherein fo many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause, than their love unto their Country; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure that ver- 20 tue, and regard of the publike liberty, should dwell together in any of the Greeks. At their comming to Rome, they were all cast into prison, as men already condemned by the Achaans. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondred, that any fuch honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since honestie had bin thus punished as a vice in formany of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senate. that these men were neither condemned by the Acheans, nor yet held to be offenders. But in stead of better answer; it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countrie, that these men should returne into Achara. Neither could any solicitation of the Acheans, who never ceased to importune the Senate for their libertic, prevaile at all; untill after seventeene yeeres, fewer than thirty of them were enlarged, of whom that wife and vertuous man Polybius, the great Historian, was one. All thereft were either dead in prison, or having made offer to escape, whether upon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of Jayle, after that they were committed thereto, fuffered death as ma-lefactors. This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done upon the Epirots. For the Senate being defirous to preferve the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiers, gave order, That the whole Country of Epyron should be put to facke. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Amylius with mischievous subtiltie. Having taken leave of the Greekes, and of the Macedonians, with bidding themwell to use the liberty bestowed upon them by the people of Rome; hee 48 fent unto the Epirors for ten of the principal men out of every Citie. These he commanded to deliver up all the Gold and Silver which they had; and fent along with them, into every of their Townes, what companies of men he thought convenient, as it were to fetch the mony. But he gave fecret instructions to the Captaines, that upon a certaine day by him appointed, they should fall to facke, every one the Towne whereinto he was fent. Thus in one day were threefcore and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoyled by the Roman souldiers; and besides other acts of hostilitie in a time of peace, a hundred and fiftie thousand of that Nation made flaves. It may be granted, that some of the Epirois deserved punishment, as having favoured Perseus. But fince they, among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence; yea, or but 50 coldly affected to the Romans, had beene already fent into Italie, there to receive their due; and fince this Nation, in generall, was not onely at the present in good obedience, but had even in this warre done good fervice to the Romans: I hold this act fo wicked. that I should not believe it, had any one Writer delivered the contrary. But the truth being manifest by consent of all, it is the lesse marvellous, that God was pleased to make Æmylius childelesse, even in the glory of his triumph, how great soever otherwise his vertues were.

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victory, with the Greeks and Macedoni-

ans. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad, it will appeare by the efficacy of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus; whereof before we speake, we must fay somewhat of Antiochen his foregoers, of himselfe, and of his affaires about which these Embassadours came.

6. X I.

The War of Antiochus upon Egypt brought to end by the Roman Embassadours.

Ntiochus the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his reigne and life. He died the fixe and thirtieth yeere after he had worne a Crowne, and in the seventeenth or eighteenth of Ptolomie Epiphanes: while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (accor-strakth.th. ding to Justine) of Jupiter. He left behind him three sons, Seleucus Philopator, Antiochus Int. 116.35. Epiphanes, Demetraus Soier; and one daughter, Cleopatra, whom he had given in marriage to Ptolomie Epiphanes King of Egypt. Selencus, the fourth of that name, and the cldest of Anisochus his sons; reigned in Syriatwelve yeeres, according to Eusebius, Appian, and English Chro, Sulpirus: though Josephus give him but seven. A Prince, who as he was sloathfull by Appelebell. nature, so the great losse which his father Antiochus had received, tooke from him the syr, Ant. 12.6.5 20 means of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeers before his birth, Daniel gave this judgement, Et stabit in loco ejus vilisimus & indignus decore regio. Dan 11.24. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus, the Father of this man) Shall start up a vileperson, unworthy the honour of a King. Under this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the high Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect: What time as 2 Mac 32 the holy Cuy was inhabited with all Peace, because of the godlinesse of Onias the Priest, it came to passe, that even the King did honour the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifis. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Macchabees, of Simon of Benjamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the Treasures of the Temple : and of Heliodorus sent by the King to seize them; of his miraculous striking by God, and his recovery 30 at the prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his successour Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the reigne of this King, that the books of the Macchabees take beginning. Which books feem not to be delivered by one and the fame hand. For the first book, although it touch upon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his storie, nor of the acts of his fuccessours, til the time of Anisochus Epiphanes, the brother & succeffor of this Selencus; from whom downward to the death of Simon Macchabaus (who died in the hundred threescore & seventeenth yeere of the Greeks in Syria) that first book treateth. The Author of the second book, although he take the Storie somewhat further off, by way of a Proæme, yet he endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeer of the Grecian reign, and with the death of Nicanor, flain by Judas: remembring in the fourth Chapter the practice of Jason the brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, pre- 1 Magical vailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor, for the Priesthood. It is also held by Jan- super Ecut. 13 fenius, and other grave Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius, King of the Spartans sent Embassadors to the Jewes, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence between them and the Greeks, Jonathan the brother and successor of Judas, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himselfe directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Amipater his Embassadours, whom he employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arim had fent to Onias the high Priest, whereto Fosephus addes, that the name of the Laced amonian Embassador was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and 50 were fealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her clawes. Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Aniochus Epiphanes, in the bundred and seven and thirtieth yeer of the Greeks in Syria. He was the second son of the Great Antioches: and he obtained his kingdome by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also he usurped from his brothers son.

Ptolomie Philometor, his Nephew by his fifter Cleopatra, being then very young, had been about seven yeers King of Egypt.

Ptolomie Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had reigned in Egypt foure and twenty yeers, in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the great Antioches, had agreed to divide his Kingdome between them. whilest he was a childe. But they found such other businesse, ere long, with the Romans. as made them give over their unjust purpose; especially Amiochus, who gave with his daughter in marriage, unto this Prolomie, the Provinces of Colofyria, Phanice, and Judaa. which he had won by his victory over Scopas, that was generall of the Egyptian forces in those parts. Neverthelesse, Piolomie adhered to the Romans: whereby he lived in the greater fecuritie. He left behind him two fonnes; this Ptolomie Philometor, and Ptolomie Physicon, with a daughter Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the younger, by whom she was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolomie Philametor, so called (that is, the lover of his mother) by a bitter nick-name. because he slew her, fell into harred with his subjects, and was like to be chased our of his Kingdome, his younger brother being fer up against him. Physcon having a strong party. got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himself in Memphis, craving succour of King Antiochus his Unde. Hereof Antiochus was glad : who under colour to take unon him the protection of the young Prince, fought by all means possible to possesse himselse of that Kingdome. He sent Apollonius the sonne of Mnestheus Embassadour into Egypt, and under colour to affift the Kings Coronation, he gave him instructions to perfivade the governors of the young King Philometor, to deliver the king his Nephew. with the principall places of that Kingdome, into his hands, pretending an extraordina-20 ry care and defire of his Nephewes safety and well doing. And the better to answer all argument to the contrary, he prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came he alongst the coast of Syria to Jappe, and from thence on the sudden he turned himselfe towards Jerufalew; where, by Jafon the Prieft, (a Chaplin fit for fuch a Patron) he was with all pompe and solemnitie received into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the brother and predecessour of Epiphanes, that impious Traytor Simon of the Tribe of Renjamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would have delivered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Governour of Calofyria and Phanicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from heaven; the said Apollonius being strucken by the Angell of God, and recovering agains at the prayer of Onias: yet sufficed not this example 30 to terrefie others from the like ungodly practices. Prefently upon the death of Seleucus, this Jason, the brother of Onian, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtain the Priesthood for himfelfe, offered unto the King three hundred and threefcore ralents of filver, with other repts and fummes of mony. So he got his defire, though he not long enjoy-

This naughty dealing of Jason and his being over-reached by another in the same kind, calls to mind a by-word taken up among the Achaans, when as that mischievous Callscrates, who had beene too hard for all worthy and vertuous men, was beaten at his own weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went thus:

> One firethanother burnes more forcibly, One Wolfe than other Wolves does bite more fore, One Hawke than other Hawkes more frist does the So one most mischierous of men before, Callicrates, falle knave as knave might be, Met with Menalcidas more false than be.

And even thus fell it out with Jason: who within three yeares after was betrayed, and overbidden by Menelam the brother of Simon, that for three hundred takents more obtained the Priesthood for himselfe: Jason thereupon being forced to Aye from Jerusa-50 lem, and to hide himselfe among the Ammonues.

From Jerusalem Antiochen marched into Phanicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mighty army of land-forces, He went about to reigne over Egypt, that he might have the dominion of two Realmes, and entred Egypt with a mighty company; with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Navie, and moved warre against Prolomans King of Egypt; but Prolomæus was afraid of him, and fled, and many were wounded to death. U.18,19,20, &c. He wan many frong Cives, and tooke away the spoyles of the Land of Egypt. Thus was ful-

Prophecie of Daniel. He shall enter into the quiet and plentifull Provinces, and he shall Danii.24. doe that which his Fathers have not done nor his Fathers Fathers. Never indeed had any of the Kings of Syria to great a victorie over the Egyptians, nor took from them fo great riches. For he gave a notable overthrow to the Captaines of Ptolomie, between Pelu-Hierin Dans. fium and the hill Cassius, after which he entred and fackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that Antiochus had smitten Egypt, hee turned againe, and went up towards Israel and Machicas Jerusalem with a mightie people, and entred proudly into the Santhuarie, and took away the golden Altar, and the Candlestick for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Shem-bread, and the Powring Vellels, and the Bolles, and the golden Basons, and the Vaile, and the Crowns, and the golden Apparrell. He took also the Silver, and the Gold, and the precious Jewels, and the secret Treasures: and when he had taken away all he departed into his owne Land, after he had murdered many men.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian war that Antiochus took in hand this Lib.6. Egyptian businesse. At what time he first laid claime to Calosyria, justifying his title by * the same allegations which his father had made; and stiffely averring, that this Province * caps. 5.2. had not bin configned over to the Egyptian, or given in dowrie with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approve his right unto that which he had alreadie gotten, when he was in a faire polyb. Leg. 816 way to get all Egypt. The Acheans, Rhodians, Athenians, and other of the Greeks, preffed $3.000. him, by feverall Embaffages, to forme good conclusion. But his answer was, that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receive their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Prolomies, then should the war be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when he saw, that it was an hard piece of work to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers consume themselves with intestine war, than by the terror of his arms, threatning destruction unto both of them, to put into them any desire of comming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the present; leaving the Ptolomies in very weak estate, the younger almost ruinated by his invasion; the elder hated and forfaken by his people.

But how weak foever these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be so strong 30 that Antiochus might leave them to the prosecution thereof, and follow, at good leisure, his other businesse at Jerusalem or elsewhere. So after the facke of Jerusalem, he rested him a whileat Antioch, and then made a journey into Cilicia, to suppresse the Rebellion of the Thracians and others in those parts, who had been given, as it were, by way of dowrie, to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis. For Governour of Syria in his absence he lest one Andronicu, a man of great authoritie about him. In the meane while Menelam the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Jason out of the Priesthood, and promifed the King three hundred talents for an In-come, committing the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Lysimachus, stole certaine vessels of gold out of the Temple: whereof he presented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lievtenant, and 40 fold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adjoyning. This he did, as it seemeth, to advance the payment of the three hundred talents promifed; the same being now by So-Bratus eagerly demanded. Hercof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Ja-(on) had certain knowledge, being moved with zeale, and detesting the facriledge of Menelaw, he reproved him for it; and fearing his revenge, he withdrew himselfe into a San-Chuarie at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adjoyning as a fuburb to Antioch. In compasse it had about ten miles : wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, fweet Springs, banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abused to lust &other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of Onias to commit him-50 selfe to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claim priviledge, from the holinesse of a ground confecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not stand to discourse. Onely I fay for mine owne opinion, that the inconvenience is farre leffe, to hold this booke as Apocryphal, than to judge this fearfull shift which Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable or allowable, as the booke seemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not fave the life of the poore old man: for Menelaus taking Andronicus apare, prayed him to flay Onias. So when hee came to Onias, hee counselled him Mac.24; craftily, giving him his right hand with an oath, and perfivaded him to come out of the Sandwarie; so he slew him incontinently without any regard of righteousnesse. Hercof when when complaint was made to Antiochus after his return out of Cilicia, He took away Andronicus his garment of purple, and rent his cloaths & commanded him to be led throughout the Cities and in the same place where he had committed the wickednesse against Onias, he was staine as a murderer. In taking revenge of this innocent mans death, I should have thought that this wicked King had once in his life-time done Justice. But prefently after this, at the fuit of one Ptolomie, a Traytor to Ptolomie Philometor, he condemned innocent men to death, who justly complained against Menelaus, and his brother Lysimachus, for a fecond robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the veffels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his own outragious will, and not by any regard of justice: fince he revenged the death of Oniss, yet flew those that were 10 in the same cause with Onias; Who, had they told their cause, yea, before the Scythians, they should have bin heard as innocent. By reason of such his unsteadinesse, this King was commonly termed Epimanes, that is, Mad, in stead of Epiphanes, which signifieth Noble

2 Mac. 5.1.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Egypt, and then were there seen throughout all the Citie of Jerusalem fortie daies long horsemen running in the aire with robes of gold, and as bands of Spear-men, and as troups of Horsmen set in array, encountring and courfing one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather forewarnings of God, all Hiltories have delivered us, some more, some lesse. Before the de-Marinings of Gougant Marining Vespatian, a star in the form of a sword appeared in the Hea- 20 vens directly over the Citie, after which there followed a flaughter like unto this of Epiphanes, though far greater. fighting in the ayre from the morning till the evening. In the time of Pope John the eleventh, a fountaine powred out bloud in stead of water, in or nearethe Citie of Genoa; soone after which the Citie was taken by the Saracens, with great flaughter. Of these and the like prodigious signs, Vipera hath collected made Prodig. lib.8.
Proprade Prisco ny, and very remarkeable. But this one seemeth to me most memorable, because the Experior English most notorious. All men know, that in the Emperour Nero, the Off-spring of the Cafars, as well naturall as adopted, tooke end; whereof this notable figne gave war-

Steeton Galba.

When Livia was first married to Augustu, an Eagle let fall into her armes a white hen, holding a Lawrell branch in her mouth. Livia caused this Hento be carefully nourished, and the Lawrell branch to be planted: of the Hencame a faire encrease of white Poultrie; and from the little Branch there sprang up in time a Grove of Lawrell: so that afterwards, in all triumphs, the Conquerors did use to carrie in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Grove; & after the Triumphs ended, to let it againe in the same ground: which branches were observed, when they hapned to wither, to foreshew the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last year of Nero, all the broods of the white Hens died, and the whole Grove of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Cafars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken 40 downe with lightning. That the Jewes did not thinke such strange signs to be unworthie of regard; it appears by their calling upon God, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Now as the first voyage of Antiochim into Egypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein reigning: fo was his second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolomie being left in Memphis, not strong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their Uncle; thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by perswasion than by armes. Physicon had not yet forgotten the terrour of the former fiege : the Alexandrines though they loved not Philometor, yet loved they worse to live in scarcitie of 50 victuals (which was alreadie great among them, and like to grow extreme) fince nothing was brought in from the Countrey; and the friends of the younger brother faw no likelihood of good iffue to be hoped for without reconciliation. These good helpes, and above all these, the loving disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor, in his purpose. But that which made him earneftly defirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein he stood of his Uncle. For though Antiochus was gone out of Egypt with his Armie; yet had he left behind him a ftrong Garrison in Pelusium; retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Egypt, to his own use. This consideration wrought also with Physcon, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister, the two brethren made

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, he was greatly enraged: for notwithstanding that he had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philometer his Nephew, and a meaning to subject his younger brother unto him, which he gave in answer to all Embassadours; yet he now prepared to make a sharpe warre upon them both. And to this end he presently furnished and sent out his Navie towards Cyprus, and drew his land Armie into Cælofyria, readie to enter Egypt the 10 Spring following. When he was on his way as farre as Rhinocorura, he met with Embassadours sent from Ptolomie. Their errand was partly to yeeld thanks to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometer in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, That he would rather be pleased to signifie what he required to have done in Egypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an enemie with so puissant an Armie. But Ansiochus returned this short answer, That he would neither call backe his Fleet, nor withdraw his Armie, upon any other condition, than that Ptolomie should surrender into his hands, together with the Citie of Pelusium, the whole Territorie thereto belonging: and that he should also abandon and leave unto him the Ile of Cyprus, with all the right that he had unto either of them, for ever. For answer unto these de-20 mands, hee fet downe a day certaine, and a fhort one. Which being come and paff, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleet entred Wilm, and recovered as well those places which appertained to Ptolomie in Arabia, as in Egypt it selfe; for Memphis, and all about it, received Antiochus, being unable to refift him. The King having now no stop in his way to Alexandria, passed on thitherwards by easie jour-

CHAP. 6. S.II.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt stood, the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or were contented to finde, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a civill warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the juster cause. Yet they gave signification, that it 30 would be much displeasing unto them, to have the Kingdome of Egypt taken from the rightfull owners. More they could not, or would not doe; being troubled with Perseus; and therefore loath to provoke Antiochus too farre. Neverthelesse, the Egyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing joyntly in need of helpe against their Uncle, who prepared and made open warreagainst them both: it was to be expected, that not only the Romans, but many of the Greeks, as being thereto obliged by notable benefits, should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had beene sustained with food from Egypt, in the warre of Hannibal; when Italie lying waste, had neither corn nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Egyptian had Aratus laid the foundation of that greatnesse, whereto the Acheans attained. And by the like helpe had Rhodes beene defended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolomies had done for fundrie people abroad, ill followed, or feconded, by other as bad in requitall: but with continuance of surable beneficence, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers fent abroad confidently for ayde; especially to the Rhodians and Acheans, who seemed most able to give it effectually. To the Romans Physicon and Cleopatra had fent, a yeere fince: but their Embaffadours lay stillin Rome. Of the Acheans they defired in particular, that Lycortas the brave warriour might be sent unto them, as Generall of all the Auxiliaries, and his fonne Polybim, Generall of the Horse. Hereunto the Achaans readily condescended: and would immediately have made performance, if Callierates had 50 not interposed his mischievous art. He, whether seeking occasion to vaunt his obsequiousnesset othe Ramans; or much rather envying those noble Captaines whose fervice the Kings defired; withflood the common voyce; which was, That their Nation should, not with such small numbers as were requested, but with all their power, be ayding unto the Ptolomies. For it was not now (he faid) convenient time to entangle themselves in any such businesse, as might make them the lesse able to yeeld unto the Romans what helpe foever should be required in the Macedonian warre. And in this sentence, he, with those of his faction, obstinately persisted: terrefying others with big words, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybins affirmed, that Martins the late Consull had fignified unto him, that the Romans were past all need of help: adding further, that a thousand foot and two hundred horse, might well be spared to the aid of their Benefactors, the Egyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to performe any service to the Romans; for as much as the Acheans could without trouble. raise thirtie or fortieth ousand Souldiers. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken by the violence of Callierates. For when it was thought that the Decree should have passed; he brought into the Theater where the assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Martius; whereby the Acheans were defired to conforme themselves to the Roman Senate; and to labour, as the Senate had done, by fending Embassadours to set Egypt in peace. This to was an advice against all reason. For the Senate had indeed sent Embassadours to make peace; but as in a time of greater businesse elsewhere, with such milde words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely that the Acheans should doe any good in the same kinde. Yet Polybius and his friends durst not gaine say the Roman Councell; which had force of an injunction. So the Kings were left in much diffresse; diffappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus overcome: and then might the Embassadour, sent from the Roman Senate, performe as much as any Armie could Audience had been elately given by the Senate, unto those Embassadours of Physicon and Cleopatra: which having stayed more than a whole yeare in the Citie, brought no- 20 thing of their businesse to effect untill now. The Embassadors delivered their message in the name of those that had sent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no lesse than his brother and Sister.

In this ambassage of Ptolomie, now requesting help from Rome, appeared a notable change of his fortune, from fuch as it had beene before three or four yeares last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which began with the Macedonian Warre; either he, or Eulaus, or Lenaus (upon whom the blame was afterwards laid) which had the government of him, thought his affaires in such good estate, that not only he determined to setupon Antiochus for Cælosjria, but would have interposed himselfe betweene the Romans and Perfeus, as a competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that 30 his Embassadour was by a friend perswaded to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts he fell on the sudden by the rebellion of his brother and subjects, to live under protection of the same Antiochus. And now at such time as by attonement with his brother and subjects, he might have seemed to stand in noneed of such protection, he hath remaining none other help whereby to fave both his kingdom & life, than what can be obtained by their interceffion which were employed against him. This miferable condition of him, his brother and fifter, shewed it selfe, even in the habit of those Embassadours. They were poorely clad; the haire of their heads and beards overgrowne, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands branthes of Olive. Thus they entred into the Senate, and there fell, groveling and prostrate, 40 upon the floore. Their garments were not fo mean and mournfull, nor their lookes and Countenances so sad and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other far more lamentable. For having told in what danger their King and Countrey flood; they made a pittifull and grievous complaint unto the Senate, befeeching them to have compaffion of their Estate, and of their Princes, who had alwayes remained friendly & faithfull to the Romans. They faid that the people of Rome had so much heretofore favoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of fuch account and authoritie, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleafed but to fend their Embassadours, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his undertaking upon the King their Confederate; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and with-draw 50 his Armie out of Egypt into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or ufed any delay; then should Prolomie and Cleopatra be shortly driven out of their Realms, and make repaire to Rome, with shamefull dishonour to the Senate and people thereof, in that, in the extreme dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchfafed to relieve

The Lords of the Senate moved with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimius and A. Hostilius, as Embassadours to determine and end the war betweene those Kings-Incommission they had first to find King Ptolomie, and then Antiochus, and to let them both understand, that unlesse they surceased, and gave over Armes, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate and people of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or using delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embasfadours, tooke their leave, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

Whilest Popilius and his fellowes were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had transported his Armie over Lusine, some fortie miles from Alexandria. So neer was he to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embassadours met him. After greeting and falutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Roll of paper; willing him to reade those Mandates of the Senate beforehedid any thing else. Antiochus did so; and having a little while considered of the businesse, he told Popilius, That he would advise with his friends, and then give the Embassadours their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinarie blunt manner of speech, which he had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rod which he held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moved out of that Circle. The King aftonished at this so rude and violent a Commandement, after he had stayed and pawfed a while, I will be content (quoth hee) to doe what soever the Senate shall ordaine. Then Popilius gave unto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Ro-

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt, without any good iffue of his costly Expedition; even in such manner as * Daniel had prophesied long before: yea, fulfilling every Danitized particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischiefe to Jerusalem after his 30.8cc. returne; like as if these things had rather bin historisied than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadors, they stayed awhile, and settled the kingdome of Egypt, leaving it unto the elder brother, and appointed the younger to reign over Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they felt, as it had beene, in the power of the Egyptian, having first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had alreadie given an overthrow to the Egyptian ships.

How the Romans were dreadful to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias. Masanissa, and Cotys. The end of Perseus and his children, The instabilizie of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octavius. With the Conclusion of the Y this peremptorie demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the readie obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; wee may perceive how terrible the Romans were grown, through their conquest of Macedon. The fame Popiliss had bin well contented, a year before this, to lay afide the roughnesse of his naturall condition, & to give good language to the Acheans and Ætolians, when he went Embassadour to those people of Greece, that were of far lesse power than the King Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadours which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much leffe used any menacing termes, though he performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochim.

Eumenes fent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victorie over Perfeus, and to crave help or countenance of the Senate against the Gallo-greeks, which molested him. 50 Very welcome was Attalus, and lovingly entertained by most of the Senators: who bad him be confident, and request of the Senate his brothers kingdome for himselfe; for it should furely be given him. These hopefull promises tickled Attalus with such ambition. that he either approved, or seemed to approve the motion. But his honest nature was foon reclaymed by the faithfull counsell of strating a Physician; whom Eumenes had fent to Rome of purpose to keep his brother upright. So, when he came into the Senate, he delivered the errand about which he had bin fent; recounting his own fervices done to the Romans in the late war, "where withall he forgat not to make of his brother as good "Live Afe mention as he could: and finally, requested; That the Townes of Anus and Maronea * Poble Les 93. might be bestowed upon himselfe. * By his omitting to sue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceived opinion, that he meant to crave another day of audience for that bufine se alone. Where fore to make him understand how gracious he was, they not only granted all his defire; but in the prefents which they gave unto him (as was their custome to Embaffadors that came with an acceptable meffage) they used fingular magnificence. Neverthelesse Attalus tooke no notice of their meaning, but went his way, contented with what they had alreadic granted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilst he was yet in Italie, they gave order for the libertie of Anus and Maronea: thereby making uneffectuall their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, revoke. And as for the Gallo-greekes, which were about to invade the kingdome of Pergamu; they fent Embaffadours to them, with fuch instructions, as rather encouraged than hindred them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate being so manifest: Eumenes thought it worthie of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. He might well blame the follie of his second voyage thither, for this necessitie of the third since, by his malice to Perseus, he had layd open unto these ambitious Potentates the way to his owne doores. No fooner was he come into Italie, than the Senate was ready to fend him going. It was not thought expedient to use him as an enemie, that came to visit them in love: neither could they, in fo doing, have avoided the note of fingular inconstancie: and to entertaine him as a friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, 20 as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof sent him home, without expence of much farther complement.

Prusias King of Bithynia had beene at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcommed after a better falhion. He had learned to behave himself as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or defire. For entring into the Senate, he lay down, and kiffed the threshold, called the Fathers his gods and saviours: as also he used to weare a Cap, after the manner of flaves newly manumifed, professing himselfe an enfranchised bondman of the People of Rome. He was indeed naturally a flave, and one that by fuch abject flattery kept himselse safe; though doing otherwise greater mischiefe than any wherewith Per- 20 few had beene charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement, to commend unto the Senate the care of his fon Nicomedes, whom he brought with him to Rome, there to receive education. Further petition he made, to have fome Towns added to his kingdom: whereto because the grant would have bin unjust, he received a cold answer. But concerning the Wardship of his fon, it was undertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Egipt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectuall protection the Romans gave unto the children of Kings, that were to their patronage commended.

But above all other Kings, Masanissa held his credit with the Romans good. His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to 40 him the more affired. In all controversies they gave judgement on his side: and whereas he had invaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but unable to win the Towns: the Romans (though at first they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let goe all their hold, and to pay five hundred Talents to the Numidian, for having hindered him of his due fo long. Now indeed had Rome good leafure to devise upon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Masaniffa himselfe was shortly by them rooted up. But hereof the old King never dreamed. He fent to Rome one of his fons, to congratulate the victorie over Perseu : and offered to come thither himselfe, there to sacrifice for joy unto 7upiter in the Capitol. His good will was lovingly accepted; his for rewarded; and he en- 50

Cotysthe Thracian fent Embassadours to excuse himselfe touching the aide by him given to Perfew, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages; and to intreat, That his fonne, which was taken with the children of Perfew, might be fet at libertie, for convenient ransome. His excuse was not taken; since hee had voluntarily obliged himselfe to Persem, by giving hostages without necessitie: Yet was his sonne given backe to him ransome-free; with admonition, to carry himselfe better toward the Romanes in time following. His Kingdome lay betweene Macedon and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in faire termes.

As for those unhappie Kings Perseus and Gentius, they were led through Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Amylius and Anicius. Perseus had often made suit to Emylius, that he might not be put to such disgrace: but he still received one fcornefull answer, That it lay in his owne power to prevent it; whereby was meant, that he might kill himselse. And surely, had he not hoped for greater mercie than he found, he would rather have fought his death in Macedon, than have bin beholding to the courtesie of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman clemencie, 10 whereof Emylius had given him hope, was no better than this: After that he, and his fellow King, had beene led in chaines through the streets, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to prison, wherein they remained without hope of releafe. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turaed his Chariot up towards the Capitol, there to doe facrifice, he should command the captives to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honour of the Vanquisher, and miserie of those that were overcome, might be both together at the utmost. This last sentence of death was remitted unto Perfeus: yet so, that he had little joy of his life; but either famished himselse, or (for it is diversly reported) was kept watching perforce by those that had him in custodie; and so died for want of sleepe. Of his sons, two died; it is uncertaine how. The youngest called Alexander (only in name like unto the Great, though destined fometimes perhaps by his father, unto the fortunes of the Great) became a Joyner, or Turner, or, at his best preferment, a Scribe under the Roman Officers. In such povertie ended the Royall House of Macedon: and it ended on the sudden; though some eight-med too narrow. If Perfeus had knowne it before, that his owne fon should one day be compelled to earne his living by handie-work, in a painfull Occupation; it is like, that he would not, as in a wantonnesse of Soveraigntie, have commanded those poor men to be slain, which had recovered his treasures out of the sea, by their skill in the feat of diving. He would rather have beene very gentle, and would have confidered, that the greatest oppressors and the most undertroden wretches, are all subject unto the One high Power, governing all alike with absolute command. But such is our unhappinesse; in stead of that blessed counsel, Doe as ye would be done unto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicitie; we entertaine that arrogant thought, I will be like to the most High: that is, I will doe what shall please my selfe. One hath said truely:

Even they that have no murdrous will, would have it in their power to kill.

All, or the most, have a vaine desire of abilitie to doe evil without controll: which is a dangerous temptation unto the performance. God, who best can judge what is expedient, hath granted fuch power to very few: among whom also, very few there are, that use it not to their owne hurt. For who sees not that a Prince, by racking his Soveraigne authoritie to the utmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his owne person) some one of his owne fonnes or nephewes to root up all his progenie ? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other neerenesse in bloud, be driven to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that governes one, the most unworthie of his whole house, yet reigning over all? the untimely death of many Princes which could not humble themselves to such flatterie; and the common practice of the Turkifb Emperous to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofes hereof. Hereunto may be added, That the heire of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traiterously and barbarously King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heire apparent to the Crowne of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortallenemie, to exercise the same upon the Line of that unhappie King. fubject; as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitorie gods of Kingdomes, not to authorize by wicked precedents, the evill that may fall on their own posteritie: so do they necessarily make us understand, how happie that Countrie is, which hath obtained "The true Law a King able to conceive and teach, That " God is the forest and sharpest Schoolemaster that of free Monar a King able to conceive and teach, That " God is the forest and sharpest Schoolemaster that can be devised for such Kings, as thinke this world ordained for them, without controlement to turne it upside-downe at their pleasure.

Now concerning the Triumph of L. Amylius Paulus, it was in all points like unto that of T. Quintim Flaminim: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person, that was led along therein, as part of his owne spoyles; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Bootie. So great was the quantitie of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasurie, that from thenceforth, untill the civill wars which followed upon the death of Julius Cafar, the Estate had no need to burthen it self with any Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to have bin hindred by the fouldiers; who grudged at their Generall, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate over-ruled the People and Souldiers herein, and brought them to reason by severe exhortations. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of his victorie as men could give. Nevertheleffe, it pleafed God to take away from him his two remaining fons, that were not given in adoption: of which, the one dyed five daves before the Triumph; the other three dayes after it. This losse he bore wisely: and told the People, That he hoped to fee the Common-wealth flourish in a continuance of prospe- 20 ritie; fince the joy of his victorie was required with his owne private calamitie, in flead of the publike. About the same time, Oslavim the Admirall, who had brought Persem out of Samothrace: and Anicius the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their severall triumphs. The glorie of which magnificent spectacles, together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings, either visiting the Imperiall Citie, or offering to visit her, and doe their duties in person; were enow to fay unto Rome, Sume superbiam, Take upon thee the Majestie that thy deserts have purchased.

DY this which we have alreadie fet downe, is seene the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectors thought, that they could never have ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the field; having rooted up, or cut downe, all that kept it from the eies and admiration of the world-But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beautie it had; the storms of ambition shall beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaves shall fall off, her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, have bin the subject of those ancient 40 Histories, which have bin preserved, and yet remaine among us; and withall of so many tragical Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mightie men have complained against infidelitie, Time, Destinie, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Instabilitie of Fortune. To these undertakings, these great Lords of the world have beene stirred up, rather by the defire of Fame, which ploweth up the Aire, and foweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation and so many cares. And that this is true, the good advice of Cineas to Pyrrhus proves. And certainely, as Fame hath often been dangerous to the living, so is it to the dead of no use at all; because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extreme ill bargaine of buying this lasting discourse, under- 50 stood by them which are dissolved; they themselves would then rather have wished to have stolne out of the world without noyle, than to be put in minde, that they have purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression, and crueltie: by giving in spoyle the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and insolent, and by having empticathe Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them again with fo many and so variable forts of sorrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatnesse nor continuance) there bath beene no State searefull in the East, but that of the Turk; nor in the Westany Prince that hath spred his wings far over his nest, but the Spaniard; who fince the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moores out of Granado, have made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, & by the many kingdoms which they possesse in Europe, they are at this day the most powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoised by the Perfian, fo in stead of so many Millions as have beene spent by the English, French, and Netherlands in a defensive war, and in diversions against them, it is easie to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand pound continued but for two yeares, or three at the most, they may not only be persuaded to live in peace, but all their swel-To ling and overflowing streames may be brought back into their natural channels and old bankes. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, and to be regarded; the one feeking to root out the Christian Religional together, the other the truth and sincere profession thereof; the one to joyne all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all Europe to Spaine.

For the rest, if we seeke a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundlesse ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which hath been alreadic faid; That the Kings and Princes of the world have alwaies laid before them the actions, but not the ends of those great Ones which preceded them. They are alwayes transported with the glorie of the one, but they never minde the miserie of the other, till they finde the expe-20 rience in themselves. They neglect the advice of God, while they enjoy life, or hope it; but they follow the counsell of Death, upon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisedome of the world, without speaking a word; which God with all the words of his Law, promifes, or threats, doth infuse. Death, which hateth and destroyeth man, is beleeved; God, which hath made him, and loves him, is alwaies deferred. I have considered (saith Salomon) all the workes that are under the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie and vexation of spirit: but who beleeves it till Death tels it us: It was Death, which opening the conscience of Charles the fift, made him enjoyne his sonne Philip to restore Navarre; and King Francis the first of France, to command that justice should be done upon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then 30 he neglected. It is therefore death alone that can suddenly make man to know himselfe. He tels the proud and infolent, that they are but Abjects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them crie, complaine, and repent; yea, even to hate their forepassed happinesse. He takes the account of the rich, and proves him a beggar; a naked beggar, which hath interest innothing, but in the gravell that fils his mouth. He holds a Glasse before the eyes of the most beautifull, and makes them see therein their deformitie and rottennesse; and they acknowledge ic.

O eloquent, just, and mightie Death! whom none could advise, thou hast perswadeds what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised: thou hast drawne together all the farre street-40 ched greatnesse, all the pride, crueltie, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two narrow words, Hic jacet.

Lastly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, calls it selfe, The sirst part of the Generall Historie of the world, implying a Second and Third Volume; which I also intended, and have hewne out; befides many other discouragements, perswading my silence; it hath pleased God to take that glorious Prince out of the world to whom they were directed; whose unspeakeable and never enough lamented losse hath taught mee to say with Job, Versa est in Ludium Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

Me use of Chronologicall Tables is needfull to all Histories, that reach to any length of time; and most of all, to those that are most generall: fince they cannot, like Annales, yeerely set downe all occurrences not coherent. This here following, may ferve as an Index to the present part of this worke, pointing unto the several matters, that having fallen out at one time, are far dis-joined in the relation. Certaining not perfect, neither doe I thinke that any can bee. For howsoever the BE GROWN TO yeeres of the first Patriarchs may seem to have beene well neere compleat, yet in the reignes of the Kings of Juda and Israel, we finde many fractions, and the last yeer, or yeers, of one King reckoned also as the formost of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in many other, though not so precisely recorded. Hereto may be added the divers and imperfest forms of the yeere, which were in use among sundry nations, causing the *Sum- * sulbs: mer months, in processe of some ages, to fall into the winter, and so breeding extreme confu-chap; s.c. sion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to choose out of so many, and so utterly disagreeing computations, as have already gotten authority, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deale more, is to be alledged, in excuse of 20 fuch errour, as a more intentive and perfect Calculator Shall happen to finde herein. It may ferre to free the booke, and likewise the Reader (if but of meane judgement) from any notorious Anachronicisme; which ought to suffice. The booke indeed will need it, even in that regard; not onely for some errors of the presse, in the numbring of yeeres, but for some hastie mif-reckonings of mine owne, which I desire to have hereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this table shall not want carefull diligence. The Reader if he be not offended with the rest, shall finde reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his owne ease.

The titles over the Columnes, have reference to that which followes under them, as will readily be conceived. Where two titles or more, are over the head, as | Rome | there doe 30 the numbers underneath proportionably answer, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example, The walls of Jerusalem were finished in the 319. Jeere from the building of Rome, and in the 3 14. from Nabonassar. Inlike manner it is to be understood, That Jehofaphat began his reigne in the 3774. of the Julian Æra, in the 3092, of the world, and in the 99. yeere of the Temple. This needs not more illustration, nor indeed so much, to those that are acquainted with workes of this kinde. To avoid prolixity, I have forborne to insert those yeeres, which I finde not signed with some regardable accident, as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings reigne; some change of Government; some battaile fought, or the like. So of the 13. yeeres wherein Sylvius Capetus reigned over the Latines, I note onely the first, that is, omitting all betweene the 4. of Jehosaphat, wherein Capetus began, unto the 17. wherein Sylvius Aventinus succeeded, and wherein Jehoram 40 first reigned with Jehosaphat his father. For I thought it vaine to have filled up a page with 12. lines of idle ciphers, numbring forth 2.3.4.5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the first of Aventinus, and the 17. of Jehosaphat. In setting downe the Kings, there is noted over the head of every one, what place hee held in order of succession: as whether he were the first, second, fift, seventh, or so forth, in ranke of those that reigned in his countrey, without notable interruption: Before the name is the first yeer of his reigne; at the end or foot of the name (as the space gives leave) is the whole number of yeeres in which he reigned, in the spaces following underneath, are those yeeres of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeere of any remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name; there it is to bee understood, that the same yeere belonged 50 not onely to the King then beginning, but unto some one, or more of his foregoers: as the first yeere of Ichoram King of Israel, was the same with the second of his brother Ahaziah, and the 22. of his father Ahab. So where two or three names are found in one space, as in the 3077. yeere of the World, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri, it is meant that every one of them reigned in some part of the same yeere, which is reckoned the second of Ela, and the first of Omi. Particularly, under the reignes of the Egyptian Kings are set downe the yeares of those Dvnasties, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise otherwhiles, the day, the moneth, up. on which Nabonassars yeere began, which, how it varied from other yeeres, may be found in the place last above cited.

To the Reader.

Concerning the Ara, or account of yeeres, from Iphitus, who began the Olympiads, from Rôme built, from Nabonassar, and the like; as much as was thought convenient hath bin said. where due place mas, in the booke it selfe: so as it remaineth onely to note, that under the tiwhere one place was, ... the the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the yeer of the of Olympiads is set downe first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the yeer of that Olympiad: as that Cyrus began his reigne in Persia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the first yeere thereof.

Now, for that the yeeres of the world, of the Olympiacis, of Rome, of Nabonassar, and other, had not beginning in one moneth, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midfummer, and some at other times: the better to expresse their severall beginnings, some painefull Chronologers have divided them proportionably in their severall Columnes, oppo- 10 fing part of the one yeere to part of the other: not (as I have here done) cutting all overthwart with one straight line, as if allhad begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I spared, as more troublesome than usefull, since the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and since the learned might well be without it. It will only be needfull to observe that hors forver the Bra of the Olympiads bee 24. yeeres elder than that of Rome, and 29. than that of Nabonassar, yet the reigne of someKing may have begun at such a time of the yeer as did not sute with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious will eafily finde my meaning : the vulgar will not finde the difficulty. One familiar example will explaine all. Queen Elizabeth beganher reigne the 17. of November, in the yeere of our Lord 1558. She was crowned, held a Parliament, brake it up, threw downe Images, and reformed 20 many things in religion, all in her first yeere, yet not all in that yeere 1558. but the greater part in the year following whether we begin with the first of January, or with the 25. of March. The like may be other whiles found in this Table, but fo, as the difference is never of a whole

The Julian Period, which I have placed as the greater number, over the yeeres of the world, was delivered by that honourable, and excellently learned Joseph Scaliger: being accommodated to the Julian yeeres, now in use among us. It consisteth of 7980. yeeres, which result from the multiplication of 19.28. and 15. that is, of the Cycle of the Moone, the Cycle of the Sunne, and the yeeres of an Indiction. Being divided by any of these, it leaves the number of the present yeere, or if no fraction remaine, it shewes the last yeere of that Cy-30 cle to be turrent. For example, in the 4498. of this Period, when was fought the great batpaile of Cannæ, the Prime or golden number was 14. the Cycle of the Sun, 18. and confequently the Dominicall letter F. as may be found by dividing the same number of the Julian Period 4498. by 19. for the Prime, by 28. for the Cycle of the Sunne. This Julian Period, after the present accompt, alwaies exceeds the yeer s of the world by 682. Besides the former uses, and other thence redounding, it is a better Character of a yeer, than any other Ara (45, From the boginning of the World, From the Floud, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertaine position. More I shall not need to write, as touching the use or explication of these Tables. Neither was thus much requisite to such as are conversant in workes of this kinde : it sufficeth if hereby all bee made plaine enough to the vulgar.
